Mr. Speaker, after a careful examination of this question in all its various aspects, I am forced to the conclusion that the method proposed in this bill is the best that can be devised to meet the demands of the people and the District upon this subject, and that this bill ought promptly to pass.

Mr. ERRETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly at (nine o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Friday next at eleven a. m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLISS: The petition of F. Von Egloffstein, for compensation for services rendered and disbursements made in constructing the model of Rock Island Arsenal for the board on behalf of the executive department, international exhibition of 1876—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BRENTANO: The petition of Wilhelm Wuthenow, for compensation as an officer in the United States Army—to the same committee.

By Mr. CLAFLIN: The petition of Houghton, Osgood & Co. and others, publishers, booksellers, paper-makers, printers, binders, and persons interested in the manufacture and sale of books, against any change in the duties on books and the materials which enter into their manufacture, without a thorough investigation, and that, if alteration be made in the duty, it be made specific—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of over 1,200 residents of the District of Columbia, wholesale and retail merchants, storekeepers, bankers, hotel proprietors, teachers of schools, government officials, and others, for the use of the atomic-steam coal-gas for light and heat in the city and public buildings of Washington, District of Columbia, or for a charter for the company applying to furnish it—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of Jearum Atkins that he be paid a reasonable sum in gross upon surrendering his patent for an improvement in rakes for harvesters—to the Committee on Patents.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 31, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on Monday, June 10, 1878, at twelve o'clock.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was read, being to strike out the words "June 10th" and insert "June 17th."

Mr. WINDOM. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the amendment will be agreed to and the resolution disposed of by this body this morning. I say so because I believe the postponement of a week will leave us no nearer the end of the session then than we are now, and that if we fix the time now and know certainly that we have three weeks within which to accomplish our business, we shall accomplish all the necessary business of the session. Postpone it a week and then you will extend it just as much further from that time. Such being my belief, I shall vote against the reference of the resolution and vote for its adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is a person whose opinion is of great value on a question of this kind, and what the Senator from Maine has stated has great influence with me also. In order that I may think it over and see what the state of the business is in the committee with which the Senate has charged me with the responsibility of getting on with its business, I think that we had not better decide the question either way this morning, and in order that it may lie over until to-morrow I move to lay the resolution on the table; and then we can consider what ought to be done and dispose of it in one way or the other to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM. I am entirely willing that the resolution should lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the resolution lie on the table? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, statements of the accounting officers of the Treasury in relation to the claim of Colonel Thomas Worthington; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WHYTE presented a petition of the Medical and Chirurgical Faculty of Maryland, praying that Congress may by law compel the use of the metric system of weights and measures in all the Departments of the Government from and after a certain date to be designated in such law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John Ritchie, Charles Cole, George H. Mikesell, W. R. Johnson, and others, citizens of Frederick County, Maryland, praying for the passage of a law similar to that passed by the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress in regard to the payment of arrears of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of George Oakley and Jacob Ginter, citizens of Bath County, Kentucky, praying for pensions as soldiers of the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of J. W. Tool and others, citizens of Emans, Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the memorial of Scranton Council, No. 229, Order of United American Mechanics, of Scranton, Pennsylvania; the memorial of Line Council, No. 121, Order of United American Mechanics, of Llewellyn, Pennsylvania; and the memorial of Birmingham Council, No. 260, Order of United American Mechanics, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of the proposed commission upon the improvement of the Mississippi River being composed in part at least of practical river men and engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, in favor of an increase of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of John G. Scherzer, of Philadelphia, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Catherine Holt, of Northumberland County, Virginia, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT. The California Academy of Sciences, by Dr. H. Gibbons and B. B. Redding, a committee appointed at a meeting held in San Francisco on the 20th instant, petition for an increased appropriation for the operations of the Signal Service, and for such increase of its force "as will permit California and the Pacific Coast and the interior plateau to be covered by its operations as they should be."

If this is done, Mr. President, the great floods which gather in the California mountains and roll down upon our valleys, causing a great amount of loss to all classes of business and especially to farmers, can be traced by the operations of the Signal Service, and property can be put in safe places, lives will be saved, and farm-houses and property generally. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, who I trust will favorably consider it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented the petition of Thomas J. McGuire, A. H. Barlow, H. M. Martin, W. G. Hutchinson, J. P. Haddock, James B. Jones and others, citizens of MacDonald County, Missouri, praying for the repeal of the resumption act of 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a memorial forwarded to me by F. Kneffer, pension agent at Indianapolis, Indiana, submitting certain statements in regard to the consolidation of pension agencies and the regulation of fees and compensation of pension agents. I move that this memorial, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the memorial of John F. Merrill and six others, citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, remonstrating against the passage of any law that discriminates in favor of workmen who are in the employ of the Government against other workmen; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1200) to alter and amend the laws relative to the filing of reports of Pacific railroad companies, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it with two amendments, first, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute; and, second, to change the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes." I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate, in the morning hour probably, as soon as the Senate shall have time to act upon this bill, to take it up. I imagine there will be no opposition to it. It is a measure very much needed, and especially needed for the purpose of enabling the Government to settle with these railroads in respect of the 5 per cent. of net earnings. I think there will be no opposition to it at all; and I shall ask the Senate to take it up as soon as the bill is printed.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 491) to promote the administration of justice in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 919) for the better administration of justice in the District of Columbia, reported adversly thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 36) to reorganize the judiciary of the District of Columbia and to expedite the administration of justice in said District, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 127) for the relief of Daniel Compton, of Troy, Bradford County, Pennsylvania, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4377) granting a pension to William Cogswell, reported it without amendment, the committee adopting the report of the House Committee on Pensions in this case.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3284) for the relief of James Johnson, late collector of the port of Savannah, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1181) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4367) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah A. Bell, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 773) making a pre-emption grant to the heirs of Jean Baptiste Beaubien, deceased, for a part of Fort Dearborn reservation, at Chicago, Illinois, and to confirm purchasers of other parts in their titles, and to convey to the city of Chicago the streets and alleys of said reservation, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of New Berne, North Carolina, praying an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing a building in that city suitable for a post-office and other Government offices, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1338) to provide for the purchase of a building at New Berne, North Carolina, to be used as a post-office and United States court-house and for other Government purposes.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BARNUM (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1339) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1340) granting a pension to Mason Farwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1341) to declare the true intent and meaning of title 2, chapter 1, section 14, of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. EATON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1342) concerning street railroads in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1343) relating to the taxation of street railroads in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DENNIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1344) relating to tax sales and taxes in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No 1345) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth M. Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHYTE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 33) providing for the purchase of six hundred copies of Hickey's Constitution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the proper officers of the several railway companies of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to furnish the Senate a sworn statement of the amount of their capital stock, the amount of their bonded and floating indebtedness, the amount of their gross and net earnings, and operating expenses, with the dividends paid annually by each respectively since their incorporation.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN, on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill making appropriations for certain deficiencies for the year ending June 30, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1082) to organize the National Railway Company of the United States, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1186) entitled "A bill amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto;" which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask the Senate to indulge me in taking up the bill (S. No. 1266) for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial circuit, which was partly considered last Monday. I hope my friends who opposed the bill then will allow it to be taken up and voted upon.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me a moment that I may ask to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) providing for the issue of arms to Territories. There is a pressing necessity for the issue of arms to the Territories. There is an Indian outbreak.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to give way to the Senator from Alabama, but I do not think this bill will consume much time.

Mr. SPENCER. The joint resolution will not take any time, I am sure.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not think the bill will be opposed at all. If the Senator knew of the number of telegrams and letters that I have received from Chicago praying the Senate to pass this bill, he would accept my declination as being not discourteous to him at all.

Mr. SPENCER. Governor Brayman, the governor of Idaho, has telegraphed to me in regard to the Indian hostilities there.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope the Senator from Alabama will allow me to proceed. There will be plenty of time for his measure afterward. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1266) to provide for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. BLAINE. I am in favor of the passage of this bill; the opinion of the Senator from Illinois in its favor would be sufficient for me; but I do not think it ought to pass without a single word of comment on what fell from two Senators when it was up last week. It was distinctly objected to this bill by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that it ought to be postponed in effect until a Senate with a democratic majority should control the confirmation I did not have an opportunity to reply to that suggestion, as I could not get the floor, but it struck me as the most extraordinary declaration that I had ever heard proclaimed in the Senate, and it has arrested, I observe, the attention of the country. I was surprised, because the original declaration fell from the Senator from Alabama, whose expressions are nearly always temperate and well considered. That was the phase of the case that arrested my attention, and, as I have said, seems to have arrested the attention of the country. The implication was that there had been special partisanism in the appointment of judges which there was now to be an opportunity on the part of the Senate in its forthcoming democratic majority in some way to correct. I know that judges heretofore have been defeated for confirmation probably from political motives; I know that the assent of the Senate has been withheld on political considerations from confirming nominations which were otherwise unobjectionable; but I believe this is the first time in the history of this country that it ever was distinctly avowed on the floor of the Senate that judicial appointments must be held back until the complexion of the Senate should determine the political character of the judge. I did not want this bill to pass without at least some attention being called to the fact that that declaration had been made on the floor of the Senate by two Senators.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine seems to have bestowed no attention upon the remarks I made when this measure was last before the Senate, and has formed opinions in reference to those remarks evidently without having read them, or, if he has read them, he read them for the purpose simply of misrepresenting me.

Now, sir, I have not said that these nominations ought to be withheld until a democratic Senate could impress its influence upon them, nor have I intimated any such thing. I said in reference to such appointments that the Senator from Illinois was avowedly a non-partisan, and knew perhaps as well as any other Senator on this floor the necessity of having judges in the higher grades of the Federal judiciary who were free as far as possible from partisan influence; that there had been no appointment made since the surrender, so far as I remembered, or since the opening of Mr. Lincoln's administration that had not been made to a great extent on partisan grounds.

In other words, I say that I am not aware of any democrat, it makes no difference how eminent his abilities may have been, who has received such an appointment; and yet I conceive there are democrats who are qualified to hold the positions both in respect of their personal integrity and their judicial ability. When we find the current running in one direction continually, an unbroken current, we have the right to assume that these nominations are made on partisan grounds, and as long as the two branches of the Government, the President and the Senate, concur in these appointments, both belonging to the same political party, we are apt to feel that political reasons have had too great influence.

Early in this session the Senator from Illinois, who is the acknowledged leader, I believe, now in matters of this kind, brought to the attention of the Senate a bill and had it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in which he proposed a very general and a very beneficial revision of the law on the subject of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and the appointment of the Federal judges. I concur in the main outlines of that project. I dare say that I would concur in every particular of it, especially in that part which provides for an appellate court and takes from the Supreme Court a very large amount of the burden of its labors. I was in hopes that the measure would be brought forward and discussed. Although I did not believe that a democratic House ought probably to allow such a bill to pass until the democratic party in the Senate of the United States should acquire a majority, I believe that it is not in the conflict, but in the contact, if I may use the word, between a republican President and a democratic Senate that we should reach the point of selecting judges on account of their abilities, and not with reference to their political views. I would shut out, as far as we possibly could, from the judiciary of the United States any influence of partisan bias.

Now the Senator from Maine takes up remarks of this character, remarks that have no other character or complexion at all properly attributable to them, and imputes to me a desire to force upon a republican President the appointment of democrats to the Federal bench. I do not desire that a republican President should appoint democrats to the bench unless they are such men as from their abilities and their high position, their pure and honest patriotism, deserve the high places to which they may be assigned.

Mr. President, it is time, I think, that we should begin to infuse into the question of the appointment of the judiciary of the United States some other considerations than the mere question of the party to which the judge may belong. I understood that it ought to be a non-partisan, a non-political office; and I understand that it is essentially made a partisan, a political office by the manner in which appointments have been hitherto made. I repeat the remark I made when the matter was up before, that I shall welcome the opportunity which I think will be afforded to this country of getting a pure judiciary, whose appointment can be disconnected not only with political, but with personal influence, when we have a republican President to appoint and a democratic Senate to concur in the appointment.

If the Senator from Maine is unwilling to risk this President after the 4th of March next he must by no means challenge me or bring me to account for his want of faith in that official. I have such faith in Mr. Hayes that I am willing for him to make the appointments, although I am not satisfied, and I think I can venture to say perhaps that the Senator from Illinois is not satisfied, with all the appointments that the President has made. Perhaps we shall never be satisfied with all the appointments that any President may have made. His judgment very often will differ from that of the Senate in regard to the qualification of men, and it is but too true that even in reference to these high places judges have been selected because they are the personal friends of the President, or because forsooth they may have in some political emergency conferred upon him some great personal favor or placed him under high obligation, or perhaps the appointee may have expressed an opinion that runs with the views of the Administration, having reference to the policy that the President shapes for the government of the country. On that ground judges have been placed upon the bench perhaps who may have been selected without reference to their abilities but with reference to great constitutional questions affecting the entire country, on which their opinions have been avowed. Whether this has been so or whether it has not been so, the country has been rife with grave suspicion in respect of such appointments. Is it not the duty of the Senate of the United States in concurring in appointments of such a character to do what they may find it in their power to prevent such scandals or such abuses as have occurred? It seems to me that the Senator from Maine has undertaken without the slightest provocation, without the slightest inducement even, except that which arises in the alacrity of his own mind, to give a political impression to everything that occurs in the Senate, to try to draw this side into political controversy and to make something out of that which nobody intended should have the slightest political bearing.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I commented on what the Senator from Alabama himself adduced. He adduced it as a reason for postponing the nominations of these judges till the Senate of the United States should, after the 4th of March next, be democratic. I have not introduced politics in the matter; but here is a bill to provide for an important Federal judgeship, reported by a Senator not in sympathy with the republican party; and when it was presented the Senator from Alabama suggested that that appointment should not be made until there was a democratic Senate here to submit it to; and the implication of the Senator's remarks just now is that when the democratic party had control of the executive department of the United States non-partisan appointments were made on the bench. Why, Mr. President, it is not for me to suggest to a Senator so well read in the political history of his country as the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine certainly misunderstood me. I made no such statement.

Mr. BLAINE. Then let me call his mind to this fact: that for the sixty years, from the administration of John Adams to the administration of Abraham Lincoln, out of twenty-one judges appointed, confirmed, and serving on the supreme bench, there never were but two put on that bench that were not of the democratic faith.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose that accounts for the eminent abilty and purity of the judiciary that we all respected up to a late period.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator may have that as he pleases. I am not assailing the judiciary at all; but I am trying to prevent his assailing it. I say there were only two men who were not of the democratic faith put on the supreme bench as Federal judges for sixty years of this Government, and the democrats took very good care that nobody else should go on, because one of the closing acts of John Quincy Adams's administration was to nominate John J. Crittenden for that bench, and a democratic Senate refused to confirm him; and one of the closing acts of Mr. Fillmore's administration was to nominate George E. Badger, of North Carolina, and a democratic Senate refused to confirm him and forced Judge Campbell on the bench.

Now, I do not think the Senator from Alabama can complain that the appointments made under the republican régime have been partisan. Mr. Lincoln appointed five judges on the supreme bench, and before the term was up for which he was elected a second time, three of those judges were in co-operation with the democratic party.

Mr. McDONALD. Were they when they were appointed?

Mr. BLAINE. No, they were not; but they do not seem to have been of a very stiff partisan tendency, for three of them, as I say, were in co-operation with the democratic party before the term was up of the President who appointed them.

Mr. McMILLAN. While they were on the bench?

Mr. BLAINE. While they were on the bench. Why, the Chief-Justice was a candidate before a democratic national convention for the succession to the second term to which Mr. Lincoln was chosen. I mean the late Judge Chase. So, if you come to analyze this question, I maintain that the democratic party in all their administration of the Government never permitted a whig or republican to get on the supreme bench, but they committed outrages against propriety to prevent it. They held the nomination of Mr. Crittenden for four months and sat it out; they held the nomination of Judge Badger for more than sixty days and sat it out. So it does not become the Senator at the present time to ask that needed judicial appointments shall be postponed until they can be reviewed by a democratic Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Maine how long a whig Senate held Mr. Taney's appointment when President Jackson appointed him supreme judge, and whether they did not reject it?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but the Senator from Maryland will remember that Mr. Taney was hot out of the partisan caldron at that time, was involved in all the partisan disputes, had been foremost as a democratic partisan in Maryland, had been a member of the Cabinet of General Jackson.

Mr. WHYTE. Why, Mr. President, Mr. Taney was a federalist, and had only recently come into the democratic party.

Mr. BLAINE. Had he not been a member of Jackson's Cabinet?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, he had. He had been invited by General Jackson from the other party.

Mr. BLAINE. But that does not militate against what I am saying, that Mr. Taney was hot in all the contests that made that one of the most bitter partisan strifes this country ever saw, and there was good reason for withholding his confirmation, although his conduct on the bench afterward established his fame as a great lawyer of ability and learning.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine will allow me a moment, inasmuch as he is bringing in question my views about——

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maryland will pardon me a moment. It all comes to my mind that Mr. Taney went into the Cabinet of General Jackson to do that which a conscientious Secretary of the Treasury had refused to do, and he was rewarded by the President of the United States for that partisan service.

Mr. WHYTE. My friend's memory is at fault. Judge Taney was Attorney-General in General Jackson's Cabinet at that time when Mr. Duane refused to remove the deposits.

Mr. BLAINE. But who was appointed to succeed Mr. Duane to remove them?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. Taney. He was already in the Cabinet.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. I say Mr. Taney was made Secretary of the Treasury to do a partisan act which a conscientious democrat, William J. Duane, had refused to do, and for that act he was nominated to the Senate of the United States as Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, hot out of the political caldron, and the Senate well hesitated in his confirmation.

Mr. WHYTE. My friend has forgotten all about it. The name of Mr. Taney was sent to the Senate as one of the judges of the Supreme Court and was rejected. He was afterward appointed Chief-Justice and confirmed.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, it was in reward, as at the time was charged—I do not charge it, but it was at the time charged by the whig opponents of the administration of General Jackson—that it was in reward for partisan services. Does the Senator deny that?

That is all the point there is about it, that his nomination was sent to the Senate as a reward for extreme partisan services, so that the record of the democratic party from the beginning of the Government has been to make the supreme bench of the United States a political bench. They never appointed in sixty consecutive years a single man on that bench that was not of the democratic faith, not one. Some afterward changed both ways. Judge Story became eminent on the other side, but he was appointed as a democrat by Mr. Madison. McLean was appointed by Jackson, and became afterward a whig, but he was appointed by Jackson, as John Quincy Adams's diary says, for betraying the administration of John Quincy Adams for the benefit of the democrats.

Mr. McDONALD. Do you believe that?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not. I do not take John Quincy Adams's diary as a bible or as a light for my feet; but John Quincy Adams in his diary says that McLean did betray his administration for the benefit of the democrats and was rewarded two days after Jackson's inauguration by a seat on the supreme bench. I speak of it because they are the only two exceptions in sixty years of democratic rule where anybody even changed from them; and now when a Senator of the democratic faith reports a bill for an extra judge we hear from two southern democratic Senators the suggestion that it had better be delayed until a democratic Senate can look over the question and see whether he is fit to go on that bench.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, who is delaying this bill? Who is delaying its consideration?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] threatened to speak two hours the other day on it.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, but he did not do that. That was a piece of banter. Everybody understood that. [Laughter.] This bill has to be passed in the morning hour, I suppose, if it is passed at all; and while thirty-six hundred suitors are waiting at Chicago to have their cases decided and appealing to us to give them a judicial force that will enable them to be decided, the Senator from Maine is raking up the records of the country from the time of the organization of the Government down to this time to find the politics of the men who have been appointed on the bench. Well, sir, there are two sides to that question. If the Senate will only disagree to adjourning on the 17th of next month and will appoint the 17th of October, I will argue the question with the Senator to his heart's content. In the mean time I hope the vote will be taken on this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I observe the Senator from Ohio does not, however, in the short space of ten minutes—all that I occupied—reply to a single statement that I made.

Mr. THURMAN. Why, if I were to undertake to refute all the errors into which my friend from Maine falls, I should have to get a new lease of my life and Congress would have to sit in perpetuity.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to say a word. I was not here when this debate began and did not hear the speech made by the Senator from Maine, and I shall not attempt to reply to it. I understand, however, he has charged that I have desired to defeat the appointment of Federal judges now because I want a democratic administration in. I noticed that the reporter, who rarely makes a misreport, reported me as the other day saying that according to my recollection "all appointments heretofore made were all of one political party," and that I suppose has misled the Senator from Maine. That is not what I did say. What I did say on the occasion was that remembering that the appointments of the judges for the most part in my section of country had been importations—not all of any one political party but all importations. That is what I said. The reporter simply misunderstood it. That was the point I made. My idea is that judges, whether selected from one political party or the other, ought, at least a portion of them, to come from the citizens of the States in which they are appointed. Heretofore that has not been done except in very few cases. The general rule has been to appoint an importation. That is what I objected to.

Mr. BLAINE. This did not relate to a judge in the South at all. This bill that the Senator from Georgia objected to did not relate to any southern judge.

Mr. HILL. No, sir; but I took it for granted that a party which appoints importations in one portion of the country would not be very careful as to the qualifications in other portions; and I did not care as far as I was concerned to give them any more power in that regard.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator from Georgia was alarmed lest some Chicago judge should be an importation. He was taking care of Illinois.

Mr. HILL. I will say that I am opposed to appointing additional judges now, and I gave these specific reasons.

Mr. BLAINE. When the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. HILL. Let me get through. I said that if we appointed one we should have to appoint more, and I alluded to what the Senator from Alabama had said, that we needed an additional judge for the fifth judicial circuit, and what I had said, that we doubtless needed an additional district judge for the State of Georgia, and what gentlemen around me had said, that we needed divers additional judges, perhaps, if you judged by the quantity of business, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, and I was opposing the appointment of any additional judges now, because I was opposed to the precedent, and if we established it there would be no end to it, and I notified the Senate that if we commenced by appointing one additional judge there was no telling where it would end. I did not want to have anything political about it. I did not care to have anything political about it; all I wanted was judges representing the people where they are appointed. I care nothing about who is judge in Illinois; but I know this: if you appoint additional judges in one district, br one circuit, for this reason given, you will have to appoint, perhaps, a dozen. I do not want to appoint any.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] having said that it was better to leave these appointments until the Senate should be democratic, the Senator from Georgia immediately followed him and said:

> Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have very little to say except that I concur in every word that has fallen from the Senator from Alabama.

And that was why I associated the Senator from Georgia with the Senator from Alabama in the comments I made on that declaration.

Mr. HILL. I suppose the context would show, and every Senator except the Senator from Maine would understand that I was concurring in what the Senator from Alabama stated in respect to the appointment of judges, because he happened to speak before me and referred to that. Immediately following the very sentence the gentleman read, I was speaking of the fifth circuit and of the condition of things existing there and referring to the condition of business and the need of judges under the rule proposed by the Judiciary Committee; and I suppose that every Senator in the Senate understood it except the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, I only give the Senator from Georgia exactly what he said. He said he concurred in every word the Senator from Alabama had said, and I supposed he did.

Mr. HILL. Read on and see what I said.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. I do not care to detain the Senate; but the Senator said:

> I am utterly opposed to the increase of the number of judges of the Federal judiciary at this time, and I hardly think there could have been a more unfortunate moment selected for the increase of the Federal judges.

Mr. HILL. Go on further.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator goes on into a wide discussion which I do not care to follow; but at the same time the Senator never dissented a particle, but inclusively and absolutely confirmed and repeated in effect everything the Senator from Alabama had said.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Maine give way a minute? I would beg him to let me get a vote if I can on this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. The remarks I made when this bill was up before are on record and I have nothing to modify in reference to them at all. I suppose that I was actuated in some sense by the same feeling or the same line of thought as that which moves the Senator from Maine except in one particular, and that was I was willing to leave the selection of judges to the interchange of views between the Senate and the President of the United States when opposed to each other in politics, and he desires to have the judges appointed by a republican administration and confirmed by a republican Senate. He desires that the judges of the United States courts shall be thoroughly and strictly partisan.

Mr. BLAINE. Did I say so?

Mr. MORGAN. I infer that you do. The language can mean nothing else according to my view of it.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, here is the way this question came up: here was a case in which two democratic Senators, the one who reported the bill and the Senator from Ohio this morning confirmed him, have stated that there was an overwhelming demand for a Federal judge. I was willing to vote for it without a word and supposed it was going through without a word. Then it was that the Senator from Alabama rose and suggested that that appointment had better go over until there was a democratic Senate here. I said nothing at all about the subject whatever in any way.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggested that that appointment and all other appointments of like character had better go over until the judiciary could be reorganized, and under the reorganization we could get a bench that would meet the entire approval of the country. I objected to taking up the subject piecemeal, bringing in judge after judge and having them put upon us and upon the country by a republican President and a republican Senate. That was my objection.

The ground of it and my object was to eliminate from those appointments all merely partisan influences. Now I will say to the Senator from Maine that while I do not reproach the purity of character of the Senator from Maine or the motives of any other Senator on this floor, I will vote on such questions for the good of the country. I will unhesitatingly vote for such a judge as Judge Blatchford; it would make no difference whether he was a republican or a democrat. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether with equal unhesitancy he would vote for Busteed, appointed by Mr. Lincoln, or for Durell, or for Billings, or for McLin of Florida, or for men who are evidently appointed with reference to some political purpose, or some party service they may have rendered to an administration or to a President?

Now, sir, to get rid of such influences as these it is that I desire that we shall have a judiciary organized under one law, and that we should take the subject up under circumstances where we shall be able to arrive at a result that would be satisfactory to all parties and that no man could raise his voice by way of reproach or stigma against a judge and say "You have been appointed under the pressure of a particular political party or organization or for a particular purpose." It was to avoid these results that I made the objection, and at the same time I stated, as every Senator who has any acquaintance with the subject must know, that in the fifth judicial circuit which extends from the State of Georgia across to Texas, including both, there is a vast amount of business which it is impossible to dispose of with the assistance of only one circuit judge, and, as the Senator from Georgia says, almost every judge in that circuit has been an importation. Recently a judge was appointed on the Supreme Court bench of the United States, leaving the fifth circuit without any representation whatsoever upon that bench? Why was that done? That may not have been done for political reasons; but who can say that it was not done for personal reasons? Who can say that the judge who was selected out of another circuit and put upon the Supreme Court bench was not selected from mere reference to the fact that he had been the personal friend of the President of the United States, leaving that entire circuit without any recognition, passing by numbers of lawyers in that circuit of the republican party who are quite the equal of that gentleman as jurists? I have no personal objection to him; I believe he will make a great and good judge. At the same time the Senator from Maine must excuse us if we feel a little sensitive about the constant rate of increase of the judiciary of the United States when we are entirely left out and no recognition is given whatever to any claim that we have upon the positions. Does not every Senator here know that a judge in that circuit particularly ought to be a man acquainted with the various systems of jurisprudence prevailing there. In Texas a particular form of the civil law, regulated by statute; in Louisiana the civil law almost pure; in Alabama, Mississippi, and in Georgia we have the common law; and in Florida the common law, the civil law, and a good deal of old Spanish law mixed together. It requires a judge not only of a high order of ability, but it requires one who has special acquaintance with the line of decisions and the statutes and the ancient treaties made with the governments from which these territories were acquired, and the rights of different kinds that come down through different channels and from different governments upon those people. It was with reference to these considerations that I have desired since I have been here that our judicial system should be reformed, and I hope that desire will be put into execution, and I shall not object that it be done before the democratic party gets the entire charge of this Government. I am willing that the judiciary shall be reorganized under that condition of affairs which will exist here after the 4th of March next, when we shall have a republican President and a democratic Senate, so as to secure a non-partisan judiciary.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I did say the other day—and but for the allusion to what I said then I would not say a word now, but the two hours that I said I would consume will be limited to two minutes now—that I desired to argue this bill. I really made the announcement more because I was anxious to get up the House bill stopping further contraction, than to run the risk of any delay, and I made the remark without intending to carry it out; but I really objected on this ground, and I will state it now, and then I am done:

that I did not want to see an increase of the Federal judiciary either now or hereafter. I believe the State courts are being degraded and sought to be degraded by this system of legislation. I would rather increase the minimum of the jurisdiction of the district courts and largely increase the minimum of the right of appeal and let persons go into the State courts, where causes can be tried in the neighborhood where they occurred. It was because I am opposed to the increase of the Federal judiciary altogether that I desired then to make some remarks, which I will not make now because the line of remarks I then expected to make would not be in order now. As the morning hour is almost out, I will say no more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT JUSTICES AND CONSTABLES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will appoint, in the absence of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 5053) to provide for the expenses of the select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NANNIE HALL.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill No. 1174. I shall be necessarily absent for a day or two, and I ask that the Senate pass the bill now. It will not require more than a minute.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1174) for the relief of Nannie Hall. It refers the claim of Nannie Hall, formerly widow of Lieutenant Frederick J. Denman of the United States Army, for the proceeds of cotton alleged to have been seized and sold by agents of the United States, to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication according to law and the practice of the court, without regard to the statute of limitation. It is provided that the claimant shall, in addition to all other matters required to be proved establish to the satisfaction of the court that she was unable, by reason of sickness and poverty, to present her claim to the court in due time.

Mr. WHYTE. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I can state this case in about two minutes, and I think Senators will not require the reading of the report. If after hearing the statement they desire the report read, it can then be read.

This lady was the widow of an Army officer before the war. She was a loyal woman. That is abundantly proved. She and her friends are known to both the Senators from Mississippi, and to the Representatives whose letters were before us. She had a large quantity of cotton, some two or three hundred thousand dollars' worth, which was captured in spite of a safe-conduct which had been issued by General Herron, whose certificate is printed in the report. Much the larger proportion of that cotton was destroyed, and for that destruction we suppose she has no claim upon the Government. About sixty or seventy thousand dollars' worth of the cotton, however, was seized and sold, and the proceeds are in the Treasury. For that she has a clear title to relief if she had prosecuted her claim in the Court of Claims seasonably. The reason she did not prosecute her claim in the Court of Claims seasonably was that she was confined to a sick-chamber, as is proved by abundant testimony, most of the time to her bed, by a dropsical disorder. She lived on a plantation which after the destruction of some of the levees in that region was submerged. Nearly all the people who could get away got away, but she stayed and aided with medicine and nursing the servants and the poor people until she caught a malarial disease; and the committee found that it was very clearly established by the evidence of her friends and neighbors, of her physician, of Mr. SINGLETON, a Representative in the House, and others, that she was in a condition of sickness and poverty and ignorance which in our judgment warranted removing the bar of the statute of limitations in this case. The committee, however, desiring to be unusually careful, in addition to the ordinary provision in such a bill, required her to satisfy the Court of Claims of the truth of these facts; that is, that she was unable by sickness and poverty to apply to the court in season. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] desires to present a motion for an amendment on that point to allow her own affidavit to be weighed with the other evidence. That is the whole story.

Mr. LAMAR. I offer an amendment providing that the claimant shall be a competent witness to prove her inability from sickness and poverty to prosecute her claim in due season.

Mr. SAULSBURY. While it may be a very just thing with reference to this case, I doubt the propriety of our here altering the rules of evidence in any court.

Mr. LAMAR. The general law may be said now in this country to be otherwise. It is usual now by statute in most States to allow parties to testify; but I offer the amendment from the fact that this bill is in some sense a departure from the general legislation on this subject. Usually that requirement here imposed is not incorporated in a bill for the relief of parties, and the fact which is required to be proven by the claimant, her inability, makes this amendment necessary, which will make her a competent witness to prove that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

And provided further, That the claimant shall be a competent witness in the said court to show her inability from sickness to prosecute her claim before the court, notwithstanding any law to the contrary.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand, I will say in answer to the Senator from Delaware, that this amendment makes the claimant a witness to any fact necessary to establish her claim at all. It is left to the general law of evidence prevailing in that court in that respect; but the committee considering that her proof of illness which prevented her making her application seasonably, presented to them, was ex parte, desired out of abundant caution to give the Court of Claims the power of examining that matter also, and on that question this amendment permits the claimant's affidavit to be received. It is like the very frequent cases in court where on an application for a new trial or a removal of some statutory or ordinary bar affidavits of the petitioners are received to enable them to get their standing in court. That is the whole of it.

Mr. LAMAR. The Senator from Massachusetts understands my amendment exactly. That is precisely it. It is intended to confine the party's affidavit to the one point, as to her condition at that time.

Mr. HOAR. I will say that the object of the committee was, and my own in making the report, whether the Senate would not strike out the whole proviso requiring her to establish this anew before the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know whether that should be done or not; but this amendment seems to me to be peculiar in two respects; first, that it makes the claimant a witness upon a point which can be abundantly established by other testimony if it be true. There cannot be any difficulty in proving this sickness if the sickness existed to an extent to make her incapable of attending to business. And, secondly, it seems to be peculiar in the fact that it makes her testimony conclusive.

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; only competent, admissible.

Mr. HOWE. It makes it competent evidence.

Mr. LAMAR. Exactly. It does not go to the sufficiency of the evidence, but simply to its admissibility.

Mr. HOWE. I should want some guarantees that the court would not so construe it.

Mr. LAMAR. You have that in the general principles of law and in the distinction that lies between competency and sufficiency.

Mr. HOWE. It may be.

Mr. HOAR. I am entirely willing to have the proviso stricken out if the Senate think it best. I think this is a very meritorious case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. BRUCE. As there seems to be objection to the amendment offered by my colleague, I move to strike out the proviso, all after the word "limitation," in line 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the motion to strike out.

Mr. HOWE. Let the amendment be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "limitations," in line 8, it is moved to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the claimant shall, in addition to all other matters required to be proved, establish to the satisfaction of said court that she was unable, by reason of sickness and poverty, to present her claim to said court in due time.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole. I think every Senator will agree with me if he will look at the present condition of the bill. It had two provisos, one reported by the committee, which was that the claimant should establish that poverty and sickness had deferred the presentation of her claim. The second proviso proposed enabled her to be a witness to prove that fact. The first proviso has been stricken out in Committee of the Whole; the second provision stands; so that if the Senate concur——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New York is in error. The second proviso was offered as an amendment to the first, and the first was withdrawn; at any rate, no vote was taken on it.

Mr. CONKLING. I went to the desk and looked at the record, and found it there marked that the second proviso was agreed to, and the first proviso stricken out.

Mr. BRUCE. No action was had on the second proviso.

Mr. CONKLING. It is fortunate, then, that I have called attention to it, as the record is as I have stated. I thought it could scarcely be that that was the design.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi on my right [Mr. BRUCE] was offered as a substitute for his colleague's motion which qualified the proviso, and that being adopted his colleague's motion had no further application.

Mr. CONKLING. So I supposed; but nevertheless the record is, "second proviso agreed to."

Mr. BRUCE. Objection being made to my colleague's amendment, I move to strike out the proviso which obviated the necessity for the amendment of my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the question on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out entirely the printed proviso and also the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi on the right, [Mr. LAMAR.] That was the amendment agreed to in the committee.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON LOW GROUNDS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask permission of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to call up Senate bill No. 542, and if it leads to discussion I shall not insist on it.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Rhode Island made so strong an appeal to me that I have consented to waive calling up the regular order for a moment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; but the Senator from Minnesota, in charge of it, yields to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move the present consideration of Senate bill No. 542.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 542) to provide for the conveyance of the low grounds in the city of Washington, under the provisions of the act of Congress, chapter 96, approved May 7, 1822.

The bill provides that the powers and duties heretofore in and by the third section of the act of Congress, approved May 7, 1822, devolved upon and vested in "the mayor of the city of Washington for the time being," be vested in and devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior, who shall execute the deeds thereby required, under his hand and official seal.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with an amendment, to add:

When it shall appear to him that the persons applying for such deeds are duly entitled to have the same: Provided, nevertheless, This act shall not be so construed as to create or revive any right lost by lapse of time.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill. What is the Secretary of the Interior to convey? What property is to be conveyed under this bill?

Mr. BURNSIDE. This bill simply transfers the duties of the mayor of the city of Washington to the Secretary of the Interior, to give certain deeds to certain lands which have been acquired. As I understand, they are overflowed lands that have been sold to parties. The deeds have heretofore been given by the mayor of the city of Washington; and now the object of the bill is simply to transfer the duties, formerly devolved on the mayor, to the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a favorable report made by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not recollect the exact date, but forty or fifty years ago a statute in reference to the District of Columbia required the mayor of the city of Washington to make title to certain lots in this city. I think they were described as the low grounds in the city of Washington. One of those lots was sold to some person, and at the time the purchase money was not paid. A portion of it, I think, was paid. After a while the purchaser died, and the right descended to the children: it was transferred from time to time, and the title never was made as that statute, which I may call an ancient statute, provided, by the mayor of the city of Washington. The object of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make the title which the mayor of the city of Washington was directed to make by that former act.

Mr. KERNAN. Has the price all been paid?

Mr. MERRIMON. It appeared to the committee that the purchase-money had all been paid and that the party was entitled to have the title made to him; but there is a saving clause in the bill which directs that the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied on this point before he makes the title.

Mr. WHYTE. This is not a specific case, but a general law.

Mr. MERRIMON. There are several cases like it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is it confined to the conveyance of the title in one particular case?

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe there are several cases.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Would it not be proper for each party interested to make separate application for a law authorizing the Attorney-General or somebody else to do this on examination into the circumstances?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think not. I think that is altogether unnecessary. There would be trouble given and time taken for no practical purpose in the world. This bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior must be satisfied that the party applying for a title is entitled to it before he makes it.

Mr. WHYTE. There was quite a number of lots on the north side of the Potomac River which was called "the low lands" at one time, and was considered almost valueless. In the pending river and harbor bill there is an appropriation of about $100,000 to open the channel there in the Potomac River, and all this land bordering on the north side of that river will now become very valuable, and what was perfectly valueless as low land probably in 1822, may be now very valuable as wharf lots. I think a general bill, without our knowing exactly what land is to be covered by it, passed by Congress to-day, might be very detrimental to the interests of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend is entirely mistaken. This case was brought clearly to the attention of the committee and to mine; I was charged with the bill and looked into it with great care, and laid the whole matter before the committee, and in order to cut off the possibility of evil the committee recommended the adoption of the amendment, directing the Secretary of the Interior to execute the deeds required, "when it shall appear to him that the persons applying for such deeds are duly entitled to have the same; provided, nevertheless, this act shall not be so construed as to create or revive any rights lost by lapse of time." So that there is no possibility of injury to the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHYTE moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill; and the motion was entered.

TEXAS-PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire to give notice that on next Tuesday, at the expiration of the morning hour, I will ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill known as the Texas-Pacific Railroad bill, in order to enable the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] who has the floor for that purpose, to speak upon it, and after his speech I shall then ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that bill, to the exclusion of all other business, until it is concluded.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SPENCER to strike out "and," in line 53, and to insert after the word "pensions," in line 54, the words "and clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. SPENCER. I hope this amendment will be adopted. I do not know that it is necessary to discuss it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I objected to this amendment the other evening, and I did it because I was very well satisfied that if we commence to increase the permanent clerks of the committees of this body, there will be other applications to make permanent clerks for other committees. There are other committees of this body whose clerks are fully as valuable as the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs. I can very well understand how the members of that committee, who are served properly and faithfully no doubt by their clerk, may feel inclined to have him made a permanent clerk; but if you commence with this committee, before the session is over, and perhaps before this bill is through, you will have applications from other committees for similar appropriations. Now, unless there is some absolute necessity for this thing we had better not do it. At any rate I cannot vote for it, and I hope the Senate will pause and consider this question before they increase and multiply the permanent committee clerks of this body.

Mr. MAXEY. When this bill was under consideration on Wednesday evening it was thought, at least by myself, that the statement made to the Senate that the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs was that a permanent clerk was necessary to that committee would be sufficient for the Senate. In that I found I was mistaken. I did not consider that it was necessary to go into details, because time was very precious; but I will now state, for the benefit of those who may listen, that a bill has passed through the Senate without a dissent directing the Secretary of War to revise the code of Army regulations, which has not been done since 1863. No one objected to that. When that code comes before the Senate I assume that, as with all other business heretofore which has come to this body pertaining to military affairs, except the late bill that has come from the House, (which is an exception, I believe, to all rules which have ever controlled in this body from the foundation of the Government to the present time,) will go to the Committee on Military Affairs. When that report is made by the Secretary of War I, as one member of the committee—and I take it every member of the committee feels the same way—will not report to the Senate that code of regulations until we have gone through the old code, compared every section of the old code with the new code, compared every section of the regulations which have been adopted since 1863, the last revision, with the original order adopting it, and comparing the whole of it with the laws. We are required to make our report on our consciences, and we cannot make that report conscientiously, in my judgment, until we can say to the Senate that the report of the Secretary of War of the code of Army regulations is such as meets the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs. It will be impossible to get through with that work under quite a number of months. It is impossible for the members of the Committee on Military Affairs personally to do this work, but they must have it done by some one who is responsible to them for its being properly done. I believe that it is wisdom for the Government, it is economy to the Government to have this work done and well done. That is my view of it.

In addition to that, any one who will go into the room of the Committee on Military Affairs, as I have to do, and will attempt to work with their library or attempt to work through those old papers, will find that there is an absolute necessity for a complete revision of the library and a replacement of books which are missing, and a reorganization of the papers now in that room, many of which have been there stuck away in drawers since 1861, as I have been informed and as I believe.

I have had occasion myself in the investigation of cases to find whether a case which I was examining had a precedent, and I have tried to look back to the original papers controlling that precedent, but they could not be found in the Secretary's office here, nor could they be found in the Military Committee room; but I was pointed to a great number of drawers filled with everything and notified that probably they might be in there. It seems to me that our committee can work better if this is done.

Again, as I stated the other day, all the business from the War Department transmitted to the Senate for its examination and consideration is by the Senate submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and there is scarcely a case coming up in the Committee on Military Affairs that does not require a correspondence with the War Department. If there is a single committee, I care not what it is, which requires a permanent clerk, in my judgment it is the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to say a word while this question is up. In the first place, I wish to express the hope that in respect to our own employés the Senate will insist upon what it believes to be right. Several years ago I was on the third conference committee upon this same bill, the House declining to agree to any amendment on the part of the Senate touching either the number or compensation of the employés of the House, saying that the House was the best judge of the number of persons it needed and of what would be proper and fair remuneration for them; and in the end we gave way, and the bill was reported in accordance with the wishes of the House. I thought at that time that comity between the two Houses, as well as the consideration suggested by the House managers, that the House knew better what employés they needed and what was a fair compensation and that the Senate knew better what employés we needed and what was a fair compensation, required the adoption of that rule; and I think so still. I think there should be that comity between the two Houses that would enable each one to judge for itself what employés it needs and what is a fair and reasonable compensation for them. Therefore I hope the Senate will stand by its own convictions upon this bill as the House stood by its convictions on the bill to which I have just referred.

Now, one word while I am up on this subject of permanent clerks, about which I apprehend there is misapprehension in two respects. In the first place, it is a great misapprehension to suppose that the clerk of a committee has nothing to do in the vacation. I cannot speak of any committee to which I do not belong, but I know that the clerks of the committees to which I belong have a great deal of work to do in vacation. I know that the clerk of one of those committees was employed almost the entire long vacation in doing work for the committee, and I know that he is now engaged upon a work directed by the committee which will be not only of great value to the committee but will save thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of dollars to the United States by making an index of all claims that have been considered and have been either allowed or rejected from the time of the last compilation that was made for that purpose.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say to the Senator that here is a very important work of putting in a shape so that they can be used all reports from our committee, so that they can have the benefit of those reports.

Mr. THURMAN. That is precisely what the clerk of the committee I refer to is doing. If you want good clerks to your committees—and we all know of what value they are to us—you cannot pick up a man at every session. You must have a man who has learned his business; you must have a man who has learned the business connected with that particular committee, and who can save the members of the committee a great deal of time by his readiness in referring to whatever they may have occasion to look at. That is a work that cannot be done by taking a new clerk every session. But if you will have competent men—and there are a number of permanent clerks that I know in this body—if you will have men who can render such valuable services to the committees and thereby to Congress, you must make them permanent clerks; and it is that policy, which has prevailed for some years, which has induced the making of several clerks permanent who before were mere transient clerks; and I feel very confident that in every single instance it has resulted in good.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, Congress has passed a resolution, says the Senator from Texas, requiring the Secretary of War to revise the military code. Very well, we shall get his response at the next session or at the next Congress. It is not a work to be done in a day. The fact that he has done that and that that may make some work for the committee does not require that during this vacation or the next, perhaps till that report comes in, there shall be a clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say to the Senator from California that this is nothing but a revision of the laws heretofore made. A large portion of that report, as I am informed and believe, has already been prepared under a previous law, which required it to be made during the next succeeding Congress, and, not being completed, it fell; but that requires only a comparatively slight addition to enable the report to be made to us.

Mr. SARGENT. If that report comes in, there will then be no necessity for a clerk in vacation, because the work upon it will have to be done during the sessions of the Senate.

I will state as a fact that, with the exception perhaps of the Committee on Private Land Claims, referred to by the Senator from Ohio, and the Committee on Appropriations, where the estimates of the Departments have to be prepared for the convenience of the committee when it meets subsequently, there is no business done during the recess by the permanent committee clerks of the body. As soon as the hammer goes down they are away and off, sometimes quicker than the Senators themselves.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from California a question?

Mr. SARGENT. We are under the five-minute rule; and of course I cannot answer many questions.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the justice of making certain permanent clerks for certain of the committees unless it should be the Appropriations Committee, and I do not know even as to that, and not allowing them to other committees?

Mr. SARGENT. There is no justice in it at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then why not abolish all or provide for all?

Mr. SARGENT. I am in favor of cutting down the list, rather than extending it. It is an extravagant way of rewarding favorites. It is very ungracious to stand here and object to a committee having anything it wants; but yet somebody has got to do that duty, and I have not shrunk from duty in my life-time because it was disagreeable. I know how these things come about, (and I sympathize with Senators,) from the pressure that is brought to bear upon them by a favorite clerk who is accommodating and kind, who makes the suggestion and works up a feeling in his favor, and then the committee comes into the Senate and insists that this clerk is so useful to them that they must have an extension of his pay. That is the history of it in nine cases out of ten, and I have not a doubt that is the case now.

It is not the brains of a clerk that does the committee work; it is the brains of Senators. The work depends upon the intelligence and energy of the Senators whether it be well done or illy done; and the amount of assistance that a clerk can be is very slight; and the amount of assistance he can be during vacation, when the Senators are at their homes and he also, perhaps, in fact, or even if detained at Washington, must be here very slight indeed, and cannot be appreciable.

Now, the Senator from Texas says there are papers lying around loose in his committee-room where they have been ever since 1861, in great confusion. What is the value of a clerk who leaves papers around in that way? It is contrary to the rules of the Senate that there should be papers left in that way. By the rules of the Senate, when the Senate adjourns at each session the papers before every committee are to be gathered up and deposited in the Secretary's office; and the Military Committee must have had a very bad series of clerks, and this one, if they have had him before this session, is a very bad clerk if this rule has not been obeyed, because it is peremptory, and the reason of it is that they shall be put with the other papers in the Secretary's office, where they are to be arranged systematically by the force in that office, this being one of their duties, where they can be found indexed at a moment's notice, instead of having to hunt through drawers and getting papers partly torn and all mixed up so that they are of no practical use. They should be in the Secretary's office, where any Senator calling for the papers in any particular case, or for any particular paper in a case, can have it put under his hand in a moment.

I say, sir, the reasons given by the committee for this extension are the very ones which should defeat it. In the interest of economy, to prevent the multiplication of offices, to prevent the increase of compensation, especially during periods when a man is not employed, I object to it. I object to it further because there are other committees more hard-worked than the Committee on Military Affairs, at any rate as much so, who do not ask this favor, but to whom it ought to be given if this is to be done, unless there is to be favoritism.

The argument of the Senator from Ohio goes too far. If we are to have only permanent clerks then we ought to give them to the Committee on Agriculture, to——

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator misunderstood me if he supposed I was pressing a permanent clerk for every committee of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator then wants to make a discrimination, and his argument does not go so far as his language seemed to imply. I say by any decent rule neither the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I am chairman and which is a hard-worked committee, nor the Committee on Military Affairs, the duties of both falling with the session, ought to have a permanent clerk; but it is a very invidious task to pick out the different committees——

Mr. THURMAN. I would not undertake to decide whether the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs need such a clerk. That would be a matter that those committees could decide better than I could, and I should be governed by their wishes.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I cannot be so complying. I do not believe either committee should decide on the legislation, but the Senate itself should decide; and if we act upon their judgment I do not know how we are going to refuse when Mr. ROLLINS—excuse my mentioning the name—the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, comes in and says his committee think they should have a permanent clerk on account of the great interests of manufactures all over the country, or when the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture comes in and makes the same claim, or the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, or the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, or the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, or of the Committee on Railroads, or the Committee on Mines and Mining—a very important interest—or the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or the Committee on Education and Labor. When they all come in and say "it is our judgment that we ought to have permanent clerks," what are we to say? I should like to inquire where we are to stop.

Mr. KERNAN. Do these permanent clerks stay here and have work during the recess?

Mr. SARGENT. I state as a fact that they do not. One of them does the work that the Senator from Ohio spoke of; I understood he referred to the clerk of the Committee on Private Land Claims. It seems to me to be very important to bring up that index, and temporarily, therefore, his services may be needed. The Committee on Appropriations are compelled to rely on their clerk to make up tables from the estimates which come in, showing where the estimates agree with the appropriations of previous years, how the appropriations of those years and those proposed agree, &c., and it is a complex work and requires a good deal of time and a good deal of statistical ability on the part of the clerk, and great accuracy, because we are compelled here to answer all kinds of questions when we report our bills, and must rely absolutely upon his judgment, it being too great a work for each member of the committee to do for himself. I do not think there are more than three committee clerkships in the Senate which are of that character. The Committee on Finance may be one. I think it has a permanent clerk. I am not very familiar with the duties of that committee otherwise than they are exhibited to the Senate. If the tariff bill should pass the House this year, unquestionably to prepare it for the next session of the Senate would devolve very arduous work on that committee.

The Senator from Texas says there is to be a revised code of military regulations which makes necessity for a clerk. Why, sir, the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, having in their charge one of the most important works that were ever submitted to a committee, had no permanent clerk, and made no complaint, and got on very well.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from California will allow me to interrupt him there, I desire to state that there were codifiers on the subject of the revision of the laws, receiving a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. SARGENT. I know; and their work was submitted to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and they were required to go over it paragraph by paragraph, and come in and state to the Senate that they had done so, so far as they were able. The codifiers in that case occupied just the position of the Secretary of War in the case named by the Senator from Texas, who is required by a resolution of Congress to codify the military regulations. I see my time is up.

Mr. MAXEY. I want to call the attention of the Senator from California to one thing. The clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs must necessarily be an expert. A man who does not understand the routine business of military affairs is utterly worthless as a clerk to that committee; and, as was stated by the Senator from Ohio, they cannot be learned in a short time. It requires time and experience to make a good clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs; and to say that a committee which has charge of all the business coming from one Department of this Government, and that embracing the Army of the United States, shall not be entitled to a clerk when the whole committee unanimously come forward and give their statement that in their judgment it is to the interest of the public service so to do, seems to me rather more parsimonious than I propose to be myself.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to say one word in answer to an inquiry made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] whether these clerks were here in the vacation. The clerk of the committee of which I am chairman is here the whole vacation and has year after year devoted nearly the whole of the vacation to the work of that committee. It is true that is a very peculiar committee, it being a Committee on Private Land Claims, in which it is absolutely necessary to be able to search the records and find out whether a claim has ever been acted upon before, and also to find out what are the evidences that have heretofore been submitted to the Government respecting it, and to make indexes. In regard to the other committees to which I belong, the Judiciary Committee has a most excellent clerk. I am assured that the fact is—and I am aware it is so to some extent from my own personal observation, and I am told it is so from a perfectly reliable source—that that clerk comes regularly to Washington two months before the session of Congress, and after every short session he has remained here for three months of the vacation. In other words, he takes very little more vacation than is allowed to the clerks in the Departments, and I am quite sure that every member of that committee would say that it would be a loss to us to dispense with his services; and you can only have the services of such a man by making him a permanent clerk.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations have adhered to the rule not to create any additional offices where it could be avoided reasonably. There is but one addition to the annual clerkships made by the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, and that is the clerk to the Committee on Pensions; and so strong a case was presented there that the committee thought it ought to be presented to the Senate and the judgment of the Senate taken upon the question whether it should be done or not. I appreciate the necessity for a clerk in all these important committees, and should be glad to appropriate for it if it could be done; but I think if we make one appropriation we shall have to make several others; and while I for one would not object to every committee having a regular clerk, and in fact I will state a very radical proposition——

Mr. MAXEY. I think it would be right to provide that every committee should have a clerk.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state a more radical proposition than that. I would to-day give every Senator a clerk if it could be carried, and I believe the public business would be advanced by it. As it is, Senators are compelled to devote three-fourths of their time to Department business and answering letters, a service which is merely clerical; a majority of them have not got time even to read the bills they are called upon to act on. I think a few more clerks would be advantageous; but unless you are going to provide for several other committees, I think we had better stop where the Committee on Appropriations has recommended.

Mr. BURNSIDE. There may not be work enough during the recess of Congress to warrant the allowance of a clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs; but it is very clear to me that the clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs should be a man of sufficient knowledge and ability to earn more money than he can get by his per diem pay during the session. The Military Committee cannot command the services of an experienced man for that salary. That is the reason I am favorable to making this clerkship permanent, so as to give the clerk more pay and enable the committee to have an efficient clerk, which it ought to have. There is no question about that. There is no committee of the Senate which is more entitled to an efficient clerk than the Military Committee, none where an efficient clerk is more needed than in the Military Committee, and I hope the clerk of that committee will be made permanent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The yeas and nays were ordered on that amendment the other day. I was momentarily absent from the Chamber when the Chair put the question.

Mr. WINDOM. The yeas and nays were ordered on Wednesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant was not then in the chair, and was not aware of the fact. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, the Chair will put the question again.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit to the Senate that where a committee comprised of nine members of this body, a committee of evident and well-known importance in the business of the country, come into the Senate and individually and collectively assure the Senate upon their own responsibility that it is proper and expedient to employ a clerk during the whole year, that ought to guide the rest of the Senate in their votes. I appreciate fully what the Senator from California has said, that it is a pleasant thing to oblige those who are thrown in constant intercourse with us, and sometimes it may be painful to our own feelings to refuse; but in a case like the present, where nine gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the duties of the committee come forward and say that that committee does require the services of a permanent clerk, I do think it ought to guide the rest of the Senate in their votes, and I shall certainly vote in accordance with their recommendation.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 9; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall reserve that amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer the following amendment: on line 1888, after the word "dollars," insert:

For fourteen clerks, to prepare plats and field notes, &c., at $1,000 each, $14,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I raise the point of order that there has been no reference to the Committee on Appropriations; at least I know of none.

Mr. EUSTIS. The amendment was submitted and referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The print is here; and it has been referred, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. EUSTIS. I have offered this amendment because the clerical force is needed in the surveyor-general's office in the State of Louisiana.

The number of clerks asked for in this amendment and the compensation stated are such as are recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his last annual report. It is unnecessary for me to state to the Senate the origin of land titles in the State of Louisiana; but any one who will read the references made in the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office will have to admit that the land affairs in Louisiana are in a most deplorable condition. There have been surveys made in seven hundred and eighty-four townships. The original field notes are now in the surveyor-general's office in Louisiana. The statute requires that these field notes shall be copied, and the copies shall be transmitted to the General Land Office here. The original field notes which have not been copied the statutes of the United States require should be copied; and if these field notes should be lost by fire or any other accident, it would be impossible to supply their place; and they form the basis of title to a very large portion of the lands in the State of Louisiana.

In addition to that there are six thousand confirmed claims to-day in the State of Louisiana for which patents cannot be issued because there is no clerical force provided to make three patent plats. Here is what the Commissioner of the General Land Office says in his annual report:

The $18,000 is estimated for compensation of clerk hire, consisting of four regular clerks and draughtsmen, calling for $6,000, and twelve $1,000 clerks—to bring up the arrears in office work of many years' standing, namely, to prepare duplicate patent plats of confirmed private land claims, of which there are about six thousand entitled to patents, and which cannot be patented until such plats are made. Also to transcribe field notes of surveys of about seven hundred and eighty townships, for a long while in arrears, and requiring one month of time to copy the notes of six townships by one clerk. Very limited appropriations for office work in former years caused so extensive arrears.

I will state, Mr. President, that this money has to be appropriated at some time or other; this clerical force has to be employed at some time or other, because under the statute the work has to be done, the object of the law being that this whole business in the surveyor-general's office in the State of Louisiana, as in other States, should be liquidated and closed in order that the archives of the office may be turned over to the State authorities, and thereby the expense of keeping up the office will cease to the United States Government. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations have very carefully considered all these questions. There are numerous applications for clerks in various surveyor-generals' offices; and there are numerous applications from all the Departments and bureaus. The Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to appropriate as carefully as possible, certainly with a very great deal of conservatism, but they have endeavored also to be economical. My own belief is that in many of the Departments there ought to be more clerks; but if we attempt in this way to appropriate, where the propositions are not examined by a committee and reported favorably by a committee, and to take the recommendations merely of a Department, we shall find before we complete this bill that we shall have added several hundred clerks to it. I think that this surveyor-general's office, as well as several others that are in need of them, can wait perhaps another year. If my friend from Louisiana had only exerted a little of his persuasive power upon his friends in the other House, I think it would have been better than to attempt to persuade us here to overrule this committee. I am satisfied that we shall need his persuasive powers a great deal more in the conference if he shall induce the Senate to increase this number of clerks as he has proposed that we do here.

The surveyor-general's office of California, as I understand, is substantially closed for want of clerks. The office in New Mexico is very pressing for clerks. In fact, almost every surveyor-general's office has demanded a larger number of clerks than has been given. The policy of the Government for the last two or three years, inaugurated in 1865 I think, and pursued very vigorously since, has been to reduce the clerical force everywhere. In many cases we have reduced it lower than should have been done. The Committee on Appropriations have not ventured to increase the number except in a very few cases. As I stated the other day, in the Surgeon-General's Office, for the sake of hastening the settlement of pension claims, we have added a few clerks. The Commissioner of the General Land Office made a very strong appeal to the committee for a larger number, showing that the business was in arrears, and we added five clerks, as recommended in this bill. I think if we shall attempt to exercise this wholesale liberality which is evinced by my friend from Louisiana, and shall carry it out throughout this bill, we shall have several hundred more clerks than we start with. I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I share the regrets of the Senator from Minnesota, that this appropriation was not allowed by the House of Representatives. Certainly it would have saved me the trouble of calling the attention of the Senate to the facts. But I stated at the outset that it was a necessity, and I do not think my inexperience as a Senator ought to be assigned as an argument against my proposition.

The cases to which the Senator refers I do not think are applicable to the question presented by this amendment. This is not merely a question of increasing the clerical force. It is a question affecting titles to lands in the State of Louisiana. The Government of the United States has confirmed these titles. As I stated, there are six thousand cases of confirmed titles, and certainly the Government of the United States ought not to withhold patents which are merely evidences of those titles confirmed, because it will cost the Government a few thousand dollars to prepare the patents. As I stated, it is not a question of mere convenience with reference to any department. It is a question of obligation and of duty on the part of the Government of the United States to place this office in such a condition that these parties shall receive the mere evidences of title which the Government of the United States has confirmed in their favor. What economy can there be in postponing such an appropriation? The statute requires absolutely that this work shall be done. The statute requires that it shall be done speedily in the interest of economy. The amount which I ask for may appear large; but it is on account of the arrears of work in this office, and if you postpone it from year to year there will be nothing but an accumulation of arrears of back work in that office, which will require a still greater expenditure of money. If the Senate is satisfied that this appropriation is proper, I do not see why any Senator should hesitate to vote that it should be made now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 7, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment. On line 2138, after the word "dollars," insert:

And the sum of $5,000 is appropriated for the purpose of investigating the history and habits of the insects injurious to the cotton plant and the best means of preventing or destroying the same. And the President shall appoint a skilled entomologist to conduct such investigations, who shall receive a compensation at the rate of $300 per month for his services while engaged in such work in the field or in preparing his reports, to be laid before Congress, and his necessary traveling expenses and other necessary contingent expenses, to be audited and allowed by the First Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations have reported as an amendment to the House bill an appropriation of $5,000 for experiments in ascertaining the best means of destroying insects injurious to agriculture. I would be inclined to stand on that amendment so far as the cotton-plant is concerned, except for one consideration. It is impossible that sufficient scientific knowledge can be obtained in reference to the ravages of the insect which preys upon the cotton-plant except by investigations to be made in the field and during the time of its ravages and before and after that time during the summer season. As I understand the appropriation which has been reported favorably by the committee in reference to the extinction of insects injurious to agriculture generally, it is expected that this investigation will be conducted mainly in the Agricultural Department at Washington. That money will by no means be thrown away. It is money that ought to be applied in the interests of agriculture: it ought to be applied in Washington City; and the sum is a very limited one, to say the least, for these general purposes.

I have had a painful experience in reference to the cotton-worm, and the people I represent have for many years past, particularly since the war. I applied the other day to General Le Duc, the Commissioner of Agriculture, for some statistical information in reference to the ravages of this insect during the last three years. He prepared a very careful estimate on the subject, which I have no doubt is just, or, perhaps, falls below the proper estimate of these ravages, showing that in two years the United States have lost $15,000,000 by the cotton-worm. If you were to extend the investigation back to 1865, I have not any doubt or hesitancy in saying that the people of the United States have lost $100,000,000 through the ravages of this insect. As a matter of course, the attention of every man in the country, black and white, has been directed to all the investigation that can be made of this subject, and for the want of some scientific arrangements of the facts and scientific deductions to be made from the facts, opinion is still entirely chaotic on this subject in the South. I suppose that out of several million people who have looked into the subject, there are hundreds of thousands of various and different opinions on the question as to the proper mode of preventing the destruction or getting rid of this terrible pest.

It has been suggested recently—and I think the suggestion is one of very great value and it comes from men who are scientific as well as men who have no scientific information—that we shall never be able to exterminate these pests or materially to check their ravages until, following entomological research, which has been so successful in other parts of the country, we shall discover the parasites of this insect. Gentlemen of high scientific attainments, who have devoted years to the study of this subject and who have printed numbers of papers, differ widely respecting it. After all, there is great controversy in regard to the origin of the worm, the nature of it, the methods of propagation, and all that; and it can be safely asserted that, unless you meet the difficulty by a really scientific investigation, we shall go on losing millions annually for probably the next century.

This worm was introduced into the United States in 1860. It then came in a very insignificant form, so far as its depredations were concerned; but it has gone on increasing from year to year until now it has become one of the most formidable enemies that the agriculturists of the United States have to encounter. If we do not direct our attention to this subject by getting into the field the ablest scientists that we can find, we may expect to go on in the way we have been, losing these millions of money every year. This sum of money when compared with the vast losses which have occurred already from this insect is entirely insignificant.

In the preparation of the amendment I have tried to limit the expenditure to a very small compensation for a man of scientific attainments while he is engaged in the field or engaged in making his report, and I have attempted to put the subject under the care of the President of the United States without the necessity even of confirmation by the Senate, in order that he might select that man from some portion of our country who is the ablest man on questions of this kind and that we might immediately have the benefit of his researches and the results of his investigations. I trust that the Senate will not consider that this appropriation is a large one, or that it is brought forward at an inappropriate time. If this appropriation is passed now before this insect affects the cotton crop we can have the benefit of this year's examination and experience on this question. I do not know any direction in which even a million dollars could be better spent, if necessary, than in the arrest of this loss which we sustain annually.

I did not bring this matter before the attention of the committee as a committee, but I have seen the several gentlemen who comprise the Committee on Appropriations, and they very kindly expressed to me, with perhaps one reservation, a concurrence in my views, so that they will not be disposed to take advantage of the precise form of the amendment or of the fact that it was not considered in committee. I trust the Senate will give to the people of the United States—I will not say the South, because every one of the United States is interested in this question—the opportunity of having a thorough scientific investigation of this matter.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama to put in the words "actual and" before "necessary" so as to read "actual and necessary traveling expenses."

Mr. MORGAN. I think that would be a proper amendment. I accept it.

Mr. WINDOM. I am convinced of the importance and necessity of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama and desire to make no opposition to it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 20th of May I gave notice that I would offer the following amendment to this bill, which is now submitted; I have filled the blank with $208.33; I propose after line 1911 to add:

For investigating diseases of swine, and infectious and contagious diseases incident to all other classes of domesticated animals, $30,000. The said investigations shall be conducted by skilled surgeons, not exceeding three in number, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and they shall receive as compensation for their services the sum of $2,500 per annum, and necessary traveling expenses, not including sustenance; and if employed for a less time than one year, they shall receive for their services the sum of $208.33 per month. Said commissioners shall be under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and shall make detailed reports of their investigations to him; and upon the receipt of such reports, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall transmit the same to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress for such further consideration and action as may be deemed necessary. The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to pay, out of this appropriation, all necessary incidental expenses of this investigation, such as transportation, clerical hire, labor, the purchase of diseased or infected animals for the purpose of post-mortem examination, and so forth. The further sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated to be paid as a reward to any person or persons who shall discover the cause and a sure preventive and remedy for the disease known as "hog cholera." Such remedy shall be tested by the above designated commissioners; and if, after thorough trial and experiment, the same shall be found successful, they shall so notify the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall forthwith notify the President; and upon the approval by the President of the report of said Commissioner, the above sum shall be paid to the discoverer or discoverers of said preventive and remedy.

Mr. President, this amendment proposes to create a commission for the purpose of investigating diseases of swine and infectious and contagious diseases incident to all other classes of domestic animals. It proposes to appropriate $30,000. The investigations are to be conducted by skilled surgeons, not exceeding three in number, to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. They are to receive each the sum of $2,500 per annum and their necessary traveling expenses, not including sustenance, and if they are employed for a less time than one year they are to receive at the same rate, being $208.33 a month. They are to be under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and to make report of their investigations to him; and upon the receipt of the report the Commissioner of Agriculture is to transmit the same to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress for such further consideration and action as may be deemed necessary by Congress.

Then here is a separate and final provision:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to pay, out of this appropriation, all necessary incidental expenses of this investigation, such as transportation, clerical hire, labor, the purchase of diseased or infected animals for the purpose of post-mortem examination, &c. The further sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated to be paid as a reward to any person or persons who shall discover the cause and the sure preventive and remedy for the disease known as "hog cholera." Such remedy shall be tested by the above-designated commissioners; and if, after thorough trial and experiment, the same shall be found successful, they shall so notify the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall forthwith notify the President; and upon the approval by the President of the report of said Commissioner, the above sum shall be paid to the discoverer or discoverers of said preventive and remedy.

Is there a necessity for such legislation? I say there can be no doubt on that question; and I now desire to present very briefly a few statistics touching this disease of hog cholera and other diseases incident to domestic animals; and I call the special attention of Senators to these figures:

The total number of hogs raised in 1877 in 1,125 counties out of the 2,447 counties in the United States is 18,987,342, the number of hogs diseased of that number is 2,559,542, and the value of the hogs which die annually from disease is $10,091,483 in these 1,125 counties. The money value of losses by disease to all other domestic animals, in said 1,125 counties, not including hogs, is $6,561,945. The total value of all the losses to domestic animals by disease is $16,653,428 in these 1,125 counties.

Now, I will take ten States which raise the largest number of hogs:

States.	Number raised.	Number diseased.	Value of losses.
Illinois, in 65 out of the 102 counties	2,406,449	491,203	$1,703,327
Missouri, in 63 out of the 114 counties	2,144,084	437,776	1,351,285
Iowa, in 70 out of the 99 counties	2,055,899	221,158	1,884,175
Ohio, in 60 out of the 80 counties	1,667,788	24,890	503,338
Indiana, in 49 out of the 92 counties	1,384,032	326,488	1,446,798
Tennessee, in 49 out of the 94 counties	907,606	175,941	489,515
Virginia, in 60 out of the 99 counties	713,275	59,868	168,174
Kansas, in 39 out of the 84 counties	689,296	70,340	217,165
Wisconsin, in 39 out of the 60 counties	671,995	9,622	26,461
Pennsylvania, in 39 out of the 66 counties	635,387	22,871	112,999

I think these facts show that this disease ought to be investigated, and I trust that there will be no opposition to this appropriation for the benefit of the agriculturists of the country who raise the hogs. Think of a loss of $10,000,000 sustained annually by disease to hogs in less than one-half of the counties in the United States; and the disease is spreading. In the North, in the South, in the East, and in the West, in every section of the country, the disease is prevailing among the hogs. I trust that the appropriation will be sanctioned by the Senate.

Then $10,000 is offered as a reward. That will bring out every discovery and every remedy known. It will induce persons to study the disease, to find its nature, origin, and cause, and to discover a remedy for it. This reward of $10,000 will stimulate all these persons, and their investigations will be submitted to the Commissioner of Agriculture. If any one is successful he will deserve more than $10,000, and if not successful the country has the benefit of all the researches and investigations made and remedies proposed.

Mr. EATON. I did not hear the amendment read. Who are to determine in regard to the success of the discovery?

Mr. COCKRELL. My amendment provides that—

The further sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated to be paid as a reward to any person or persons who shall discover the cause and a sure preventive and remedy for the disease known as "hog cholera." Such remedy shall be tested by the above designated commissioners—and if, after thorough trial and experiment, the same shall be found successful, they shall so notify the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall forthwith notify the President; and upon the approval by the President of the report of said Commissioner, the above sum shall be paid to the discoverer or discoverers of said preventive and remedy.

It must be sanctioned by three surgeons, and approved by the Commissioner of Agriculture and by the President.

Mr. EATON. I am very much disposed to vote for this amendment; I think it is well, but I do not quite see the propriety of a board to establish this matter. How long is it to continue? One week, one month, or one year?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are to report to Congress, and be under the control entirely of Congress.

Mr. EATON. I understand that three intelligent scientific men might very well think that there was a specific cure for a certain disease and they might so report, and they might be most terribly mistaken. That has been shown a great many times. I do not quite like that clause in my friend's amendment. I believe it well to look into this matter and see if we can remedy this great evil.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that the offering of a reward will cause the people all over the country to make investigations and examinations into the cause and origin of the disease and the remedy, and to test it. I say very frankly that I doubt exceedingly whether any man will ever be able to get the reward. The State of Missouri has offered $10,000 reward; I believe it was voted over a year ago; and nobody has yet been able to make claim to it; but the provision will do good, because it will cause investigations, inquiries, and reports, and the country will have the benefit of the results of these investigations.

Mr. WINDOM. I was about to ask the Senator from Missouri whether we have received any petitions in regard to this matter, (I do not remember them,) or memorials of Legislatures or anything else, asking Congress to act upon the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not sure; I have not kept pace with all the memorials and petitions that have been presented from the Legislatures of the various States. I think some have been presented on this subject. I know there has been a very great interest in the matter. I have received a number of letters. In the beginning of the session I offered a resolution calling upon the Commissioner of Agriculture for the information which he had, and he sent us a pamphlet which has been printed and which contains reports from almost every State in the Union and from many counties in various States of the Union, showing a very great and decided interest in this matter, and many communications from the leading farmers and stock-raisers suggesting that some legislation should be granted by Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. Has the Committee on Agriculture acted upon this matter, I will ask the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think that the Committee on Agriculture has acted upon it. This amendment has been submitted to the Commissioner of Agriculture and it meets his approbation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will ask if the Commissioner of Agriculture did not himself last fall send persons down to Virginia and other States to investigate the disease among hogs? I remember having a conversation with him, I think in the month of October, or in November, in which he stated to me that he had sent persons qualified to examine into the nature of the disease, down I think into the State of North Carolina. I was making inquiries of him in that regard, because at that time in my own State there were quite a number of hogs dying of the disease.

I think the sum mentioned in the amendment could be very wisely appropriated provided the Department is not already authorized to make such an investigation; but I have an idea that the Department of Agriculture is already charged with duties of that kind. The sum of $30,000 would be a very small amount to pay for ascertaining the nature of the disease among hogs or other live stock. I cannot, however, with my present impressions, vote for that portion of the amendment which proposes a reward for some person who may discover the cause of the disease. The whole time of these commissioners will be taken up in determining who is entitled to that reward, if it is offered. There will be hundreds of men all over the country who will suppose that they have found a specific for the disease; they will submit their claims to the commissioners, and their whole time will be taken up in determining that matter. I have no doubt that an appropriation by Congress to ascertain the nature of this disease and the remedy, so far as any remedy can be suggested, would be a wise appropriation, and for that part of the amendment I desire to vote.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe I had the floor. Do the remarks of the Senator from Delaware and others come out of my time?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Minnesota asked me a question, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Delaware, and I desire to answer the question in connection with a reply to the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield for that purpose?

Mr. WINDOM. I think if I do I shall not have an opportunity to say what I wish to submit.

I only want to say that this amendment has not been examined by the Committee on Agriculture to whom it should have been referred and who doubtless would have given it careful attention. It is a very broad-gauge amendment. My friend from Missouri seldom does anything in a small way, and I think that in this case he has presented a characteristic amendment. Thirty thousand dollars to pay for traveling expenses and purchase of hogs, and clerk hire, &c., for this commission of hog doctors which he proposes to send out into the country seems to me to be very liberal. The statistics which he gives us show that this hog disease is common in every State in the Union. If so, it need not require $30,000 for these physicians to travel through the whole country to obtain a knowledge of the disease; they can get their information almost anywhere. Therefore I think the amendment has not been well considered in that regard.

With reference to the $10,000 which he proposes as a reward, it seems to me it is adopting a new precedent in legislation which is not very safe. I think that these eminent physicians would be as likely to discover the causes of this disease as any one who might set to work for the $10,000 reward. Forty thousand dollars for a test of this question is rather too liberal. I think on the whole the amendment had better be defeated to-day and referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I ask the attention of my friend from Missouri to that point. Let the amendment be withdrawn to-day, I suggest to my friend, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture; let them carefully examine it; it more properly belongs on the sundry civil bill than on this bill; and if it is carefully examined by that committee and some reasonable amount suggested, I apprehend it will meet with less objection than on this bill. I should be very unwilling to vote for so large an amount, and especially for the reward which is proposed by the Senator from Missouri. If it is insisted upon I hope that the amendment will be rejected to-day. I do not know but that I should vote for something of the kind on the sundry civil bill; but this amendment proposes altogether too large an amount to make the test. It is a little bit extravagant, I will say to my economical friend from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just one moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent, the Senator from Missouri can proceed, as he has occupied ten minutes already. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to read from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, which was communicated by the President in answer to the resolution introduced by me early in the session.

After going on and describing the disease prevailing all over the country, he says:

This interest is too great to be longer neglected by the General Government. Not only the health of its citizens, but one of the greatest sources of our wealth, demands that it should furnish the means for a most searching and thorough investigation into the causes of all diseases affecting live stock.

In answer to what the Senator from Delaware said, I will state that it is true that the Commissioner of Agriculture, I believe out of the contingent fund or some small fund, has been making last year a partial investigation, such as he could, here in Virginia and Maryland and contiguous to the capital; but it has been on a very small scale. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that this disease prevails at different times and has different characteristics in different sections of the country, and in different seasons of the year. I do not think that $30,000 is too much for the payment of the salaries of these commissioners and for the necessary investigations which they will have to make. If the Senate will permit this amendment to go in the bill and get the matter started, I am willing to reduce the amount; but I think that an appropriation for the purpose is absolutely necessary. When $40,000 only is appropriated to try to save an annual loss of $16,653,000, in less than half the counties of the Union, to the stock-raisers and farmers of this country, I do not think that is an exorbitant appropriation; I think it is economical. You would appropriate $40,000 to be expended to save to the stock-raisers and farmers of this country sixteen million six hundred and fifty-three thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars' worth of stock every year, and it is not an excessive or a large amount to appropriate for the purpose. It is true I did not have the amendment referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I supposed it was perfectly appropriate to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations and that that committee would consider it itself. I think it is appropriate. As a matter of course, I shall continue to urge the amendment in some shape until the Senate passes it. If I cannot get it ingrafted on this bill, I shall try it upon some other bill; but I do really think it should be placed upon this measure. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] says "put it on the river and harbor bill." [Laughter.] I shall seek to put it on any bill so that it can be passed. I think that the chairman of the committee ought not to insist that this amendment should be voted down. If he will agree to fix the amount at $20,000 I shall be willing to take that and let it be passed; but I really think that the amendment ought to be passed upon this bill. It comes under the head of the appropriations for "the Department of Agriculture" properly, and this seems to me to be the appropriate place for it.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish merely to say a word in connection with this amendment. The importance of the object which it seeks to attain to the agricultural interest certainly cannot be well overrated, but I think it very doubtful whether much benefit will be derived from the passage of the amendment other than the direction of the public attention to the investigation of the causes of this disease. That is no new thing, however. In many of the States the agricultural societies in various localities have addressed inquiries to the investigation of this very question, and a large amount of information has been collected and collated and thrown together upon it. It seems to be well established that what is known as hog cholera really includes several different classes of disease, but they are classified under that general term. It is a disease which prevails as an epidemic, and the same laws apply to this disease that apply to epidemics which affect human beings. It is impossible, therefore, in the nature of things, that any specific remedy can ever be devised under which this reward of $10,000 can be claimed. Hundreds of nostrums, no doubt, will be brought forward and urged as affording this great panacea; but the fact of the business will be that when you test them it will be seen in many instances that the hogs will not be affected that use the remedy; but about the time the discoverer succeeds in establishing a reputation for it those that have taken the disease will be affected and die from it. That has been the experience in my own knowledge in numerous instances.

I think the suggestion of the chairman of the committee is eminently wise. Let this amendment be withdrawn; let a separate bill, more carefully considered perhaps, be presented and referred to the appropriate committee, and let the measure stand on its own merits. I for one do not hesitate to say that I am ready to afford every encouragement possible to a proper investigation of this matter in order that the nature and character of the disease may be established and such preventives and remedies applied as in the nature of the case are admissible. I do not believe, however, that it is any more possible for a specific remedy to be discovered which will prevent the prevalence of hog cholera than for one to be found which will eradicate the cholera or any other epidemic affecting the human race.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will reduce the amount to be appropriated by the amendment, before the vote is taken upon it, from $30,000 to $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment by reducing the amount to $20,000. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the vote be taken again on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Missouri having modified his amendment, it becomes a new proposition, and therefore I suppose I may say a word. I vote against this proposition, not because I desire to commit myself against the investigation, but because I think myself that the amendment has not been stated with sufficient care, and as the sundry civil bill is yet to come and is a more appropriate place for the amendment than this bill, and as the Committee on Agriculture will have time to examine it and to perfect the amendment, I think it better to reject it now and consider it again when the sundry civil bill is before the Senate. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the solicitation of the Senator from Minnesota, who is so very persuasive, and of other Senators, I will yield to the suggestion to have the amendment referred to the Committee on Agriculture, withdrawing it as an amendment to this bill that it may come in upon the other bill suggested; and I give notice that I shall then press its consideration, when I hope to have the influence of the very interesting Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 24 and ask that the words "minute and journal clerk" be restored there. They were stricken out by the committee. Afterward on further examination it appears that this should not have been done. I have talked with several members of the committee and they agree that the words may be restored.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I move in line 24 to insert the words "and minute and journal clerk," which were stricken out on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 28 I move to strike out the words "minute and journal clerk," which were inserted at that place on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, so as to make the language conform.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to offer a few formal amendments made necessary by amendments that have already been made. In line 1433 I move to amend the total so that it will read $202,280. That is made necessary by some amendments that were agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. In line 2049, after "five," I move to insert the word "hundred." The word "hundred" has been omitted by mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. In line 603 I move to strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to read "forty clerks of class 1," instead of "thirty-five clerks of class 1." The reason for this is that the passage of the act providing for pensioners of the war of 1812 has materially increased the duty of the Third Auditor's Office. The rolls are in a very bad condition and the business ought to be taken care of at once, and it cannot be unless there is an additional force. We should add five clerks for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. In line 605 by mistake the words "one messenger" are omitted. I move that those words be inserted in that line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to change the total in lines 609 and 610, on account of the amendments just made, to $191,550 instead of $184,510.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDON. In line 15 the total should read $181,192, instead of $178,030. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I feel inclined to offer an amendment, but before doing so I will address an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In line 1894 of the bill, page 77, it is provided:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota, $2,000, and for the clerks in his office, $3,500.

I observe in regard to the surveyor-general in the other Territories, I think without exception, (perhaps there may be one exception,) the salary appropriated for them is either $2,500 or more than $2,500. The Territory of Dakota is a very extensive Territory indeed. There is, I think, more agricultural land in that Territory than in any other Territory of the United States, and on account of the discovery of gold and silver in the Black Hills the Territory is rapidly filling up. In consequence of this rapid accession to the population of the Territory, the business of the surveyor-general necessarily has very largely increased. I should like to move to amend the bill so as to appropriate $2,500 for the salary of the surveyor-general and $5,000 for the clerks in his office.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the law fixes the salary of this surveyor-general now at $2,000. That seems to be all that is estimated for the salary of the surveyor-general, and under the principle we have adopted not to increase salaries above the amount given for the current year we could hardly make an exception in this case.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. How is it about the amount appropriated for clerks in his office?

Mr. WINDOM. That is a discretionary item, of course. That will depend upon the facts in our possession. I am aware of the fact stated by the Senator from Wisconsin that there is a very large amount of business there, and that the Territory of Dakota is very rapidly settling up. I have no objection, unless it meets with objection from other Senators, to increasing the appropriation for clerks in his office, so that the committee of conference may have a chance to consider that matter and if it be found to be correct we can agree to it in conference.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no branch of the public service that is suffering so much as the land surveys. All over the West and in some of the Southern States the same difficulty exists. Congress has for years systematically, or unsystematically rather, cut down the appropriation for this purpose until they amount to almost nothing. There is scarcely as much given now for the surveys of all the States and Territories together as formerly was given in a single State or Territory. The result of it is that settlers going upon the virgin lands and making themselves homes are not able to get surveys and are kept for years without any title to their lands. It is a very unsatisfactory condition of things. The trouble is that litigations arise, and especially with railroad companies who have land grants, because as is very well known the settler cannot bring his claim into the General Land Office for settlement until after a survey of the lands. The lands are withdrawn for the railroads, the settler dies, perhaps, or in his life-time he desires to sell out to somebody else, and the person to whom he sells has then not so old a claim as the railroad company, and the land is entirely lost for that reason to the settler and reverts to the railroad company. This has caused a great deal of confusion in my own State.

So far as the operation of this system in California is concerned it has very nearly stopped surveys, and that great surveyor-general's office, which has to deal with Mexican land claims, with all the varied mining interests, both quartz and placer claims, with pre-emption and homestead settlements—that office to-day is just about closed on account of there being no money to pay for the clerks necessary to be employed therein, so much so that there will have to be a deficiency this year when the deficiency bill comes in, or else an entire suspension of the work. I think in this direction Congress can very wisely act by making more liberal appropriations and bring money into the Treasury, as well as give great relief to the settler.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the bill in line 1895 by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "five," and in line 1895 by striking out "five hundred;" so as to read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota, $2,000, and for the clerks in his office, $5,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope that will be agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I am not authorized to speak for the Committee on Appropriations on this point, because it has not been examined, but I will state that the appropriations for these surveys for several years past have been regularly $6,300 until last year, when it was $4,300, and I am convinced that the amount proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is not too large.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS. In line 1888, I move to strike out "two" and insert "six" before the word "thousand;" so as to read:

For compensation of surveyor-general of Louisiana, $1,800, and for the clerks in his office, $6,000.

And in line 1905, before "thousand," I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

For surveyor-general of California, $2,750; and for clerks in his office, $12,000.

Mr. SARGENT. That is for the same object.

Mr. WINDOM. Since the matter was under discussion before in the Senate, I find a note in the estimates which reads as follows:

The $18,000 is estimated for compensation of clerk hire, consisting of four regular clerks and draughtsmen, calling for $6,000, and twelve one-thousand-dollar clerks to bring up the arrears in office work of many years' standing, namely: to prepare duplicate patent plats of confirmed private land claims, of which there are about six thousand entitled to patents, and which cannot be patented until such plats are made; also to transcribe field notes of surveys of about seven hundred and eighty townships, for a long while in arrears, and requiring one month of time to copy the notes of six townships by one clerk. Very limited appropriations for office work in former years caused so extensive arrears.

As the Senator from Louisiana has reduced his proposition to reasonable limits, I desire to make no opposition to it unless it meets with opposition from some other Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair understands that there have been some reservations. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] desired to reserve an amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator from California will not insist upon reserving it.

Mr. SARGENT. I will leave that matter to the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be concurred in in gross?

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PADDOCK. In line 2075, where the words "one thousand nine hundred" occur, I move to strike out "one thousand nine hundred" and insert "two thousand;" which would be exactly the salary provided for by law for the entomologist of the Agricultural Department. This officer is one of the most accomplished officers in the country. He is a man of very great scientific attainments. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee upon what theory the reduction was made. The law fixes the salary at $2,000.

Mr. WINDOM. It is precisely the same question that was discussed and decided by the Senate the day before yesterday. It was done in 1876 or 1877 as a sort of compromise in order to come to an agreement with the House of Representatives.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am sure that the chairman of the committee will agree with me that it is a great wrong and a great injustice to a man of the abilities of Professor Riley, who has now charge of that service, and who ought not to be required to serve for even $2,000; he ought to have $4,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I appreciate the fact as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, but for the same reasons precisely as were stated day before yesterday, if we undertake to revise and to reinstate these salaries to where they ought to be as required by law, we shall have to revise the bill and make a great many changes. The Committee on Appropriations have deemed it advisable to restore the salaries to where they are now; without attempting to change them to conform to the existing law, not desiring to go into the question of salaries this year at all.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think the committee and the Senate ought to be willing to make an exception in this case and in that of the chemist of the Agricultural Department in line 2076. The entomologist and the chemist are two scientists of great experience and of great ability; they are men who have rendered very great service in their specialties. Professor Riley has done more in his specialty perhaps than any man living to-day, and he has a reputation that is world-wide. The Commissioner of Agriculture recommends that the salary should be placed at a figure exactly $1,000 in excess of what it would be if placed at what the law authorizes. Therefore I shall move the amendment that where the words "one thousand nine hundred" occur they be stricken out and the words "two thousand" inserted; so as to read:

Entomologist, $2,000; chemist, $2,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether there are any other items in the bill which would be affected if that change were made?

Mr. WINDOM. The change would not affect any other items, but to do the same justice to conform to the principle which the Senator proposes would require a large number of amendments to the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think it would trench upon any principle at all to make these cases exceptional in regard to these scientific men, whose services are so valuable to the country, increasing their pay $100 in order that they may receive the salary which the law allows. It is nothing more than ought to be conceded by every Senator and every Member of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 7, noes not counted.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAINE. During the brief debate in the morning hour this morning, I referred to the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] as a democratic Senator. I have been told that that designation was not exactly a proper one, and probably not entirely agreeable to the Senator. I merely meant to imply that he was not co-operating with the republican party. I was also mistaken in stating that in the campaign of 1868 he was against the republicans. I had not the remotest intention of misrepresenting the honorable Senator in any respect, and only regret that he is not even less a democrat than he is.

DISTRICT JUSTICES AND CONSTABLES.

Mr. DORSEY. I wish to make a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 3969, regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are the papers in the possession of this body?

Mr. DORSEY. The other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the report cannot be made here until we get the papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the report cannot be received.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report and concurrent resolution in relation to the award made by the fisheries commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appeal to the Senator from Maine to withdraw his motion in order that I may move to take up the bill providing for the regulation of the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. Of course that is a very important bill that ought to be considered and sent to the House of Representatives, if the Senate should agree to it, in season that it may be acted upon there before the adjournment, if the House chooses so to do. This appropriation bill of my honorable friend from Maine can be considered almost at any time, and will not take a great while I hope. I trust in fact that the bill I propose to take up will not; I am sure it will not; and I wish the Senator from Maine would allow me to call that up.

Mr. HAMLIN. I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to consider this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I gave notice last week, before the Senator reported the resolution from his committee.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press his measure upon the Senate at the present time. I gave notice some little time ago that as soon as I could obtain the floor for the purpose, I would ask the Senate to consider the bill to establish post-roads, and for other purposes. There are matters included in that bill in which the Post-Office Department take a deep interest, and it is very important that early action should be taken upon it; in fact, the bill ought to pass both Houses before the 10th of next month. I feel it my pressing duty to urge the Senate to its consideration, and I trust the Senator from Maine will yield that I may get it up. I do not think it will take a great while to consider the bill and pass it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I had the honor to report on Thursday of last week the bill from the select committee on the question of counting the presidential vote, I gave notice then that I should ask the Senate this week to take it up and consider it. That was before my friend from Maine had reported the resolution which he now asks the Senate to consider. I appeal to him and also to my friend from Michigan, to consider the nature and importance of that bill, and the desirability of its being acted upon and that they both allow the bill to be taken up and considered, as it was first reported;—I do not know as to its being reported before the post-route bill, which is a matter to be attended to at any time; but as to the other measure, the bill to which I refer was first reported and notice was then given that at the earliest opportunity this week I should move to take it up. I feel it my duty, therefore, to appeal to my friend from Maine to allow me to proceed with it.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, I must confess that I am surprised that the Senator from Michigan should ask to take up the post-route bill before the bill concerning the repeal of the resumption act and the various amendments thereto, which has been here six months, shall have been taken up. If I am not mistaken I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that the financial bill should be brought up immediately after the disposition of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and that a vote should be had upon it and the matter disposed of one way or the other. That bill has been here now some six months, and I hope that no other business will intervene until it shall be disposed of. All Senators I presume have already expressed the views that they may entertain on the subject, so that there will be nothing to do except to take a vote. That can be done in a very short time; and let the people of the country know what they are to depend upon, whether we are to have the resumption act repealed or not. I hope that what I understood to be the arrangement will be carried out, and that we shall have a vote upon that question before any other action of any kind whatever is taken.

Mr. SPENCER. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Maine——

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot amend that under the rules.

Mr. SPENCER. By substituting therefor that we proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire first to say that the river and harbor bill is now reported and on our Calendar. It is an appropriation bill; and it will have to go to a committee of conference. I suppose every Senator here has made up his mind as to how he will vote; I know I have; and there is no time to spare. We can take up the river and harbor bill this afternoon and pass it before we adjourn, if we stay in session until six o'clock. I hereby give notice that I shall move to lay aside the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the river and harbor bill when the motion is in order. I understand that the motion is not now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not yet.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to say, in answer to what was said by the Senator from West Virginia, that it is not my design to defer the consideration of the bill to which he made reference. It was not my understanding, however, that it was to be called up immediately after the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The other finance bill, which was recently passed, arresting the contraction of greenbacks, was taken up and disposed of; but the Postmaster-General is pressing daily for the consideration of the bill that I am now endeavoring to get up. I say to the Senator that when the post-route bill has been considered, it will then be my object to seek the attention of the Senate upon the bill to which reference has been made by him.

Mr. HEREFORD. With the understanding on the part of the Senator from Michigan that he is to call up the bill directly after the disposition of the post-route bill, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such understanding. I give notice that I shall move the other bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did not say there was such an understanding with the Senate, but the understanding is with the Senator from Michigan, who has charge of the bill, that he will himself ask that it be taken up. Whether it shall be taken up will depend upon the vote of the Senate. All we ask is that the Senator from Michigan will give us an opportunity to vote upon the subject. The bill is in his charge.

Mr. FERRY. I am not and have not been disposed to neglect any matter that has been confided to my charge. I have sought to advance the public interest. With that object in view, when the other bill was up, I occupied but very little of the attention of the Senate, for the purpose of getting the bill through, which was passed in four hours after it was taken up. My object is now to have considered another measure which is of great interest to one Department of this Government, in which all the people of the United States are interested. When that is accomplished, I shall then attempt to get the floor and ask the Senate to consider the other financial bill. That certainly ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that the appropriation bills will always be considered as taking precedence of any other bill, and especially of the bill now spoken of by the Senator from Michigan. We have substantially passed all that is required upon the subject of the finances at this session. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia need be disturbed very much if no further legislation is had upon the subject of finance at this session.

Mr. HAMLIN. I feel the force of the appeal of the Senator from Vermont, but I, in my turn, appeal to him and I appeal to the Senate. I say that there is no question which we are more imperiously called upon to act upon and decide than the question to which I have invited the attention of the Senate. I concede the importance of the measure suggested by the Senator from Vermont, but in one material point of view it is certainly of far less importance than the measure to which I have asked the attention of the Senate; it is not absolutely necessary that it shall receive the action of this body or of Congress at this session, though it is desirable and will have my cordial support. But it is absolutely necessary, if we would avoid an extra session, that we shall determine our action in relation to the fisheries award. I think, therefore, that it is more important to proceed with it. The Senator from Vermont says he trusts it will take but a little period of time. I trust so too; and if the Senator will allow us to take it up I hope we shall dispose of it in a very limited time. I propose to occupy but a very little period of time in the Senate upon it.

Mr. SPENCER. I do hope that the Senate will proceed this afternoon with the river and harbor bill and dispose of it. It is an important bill, a bill in which the constituency of every Senator here is interested. It is necessary for the bill to go to a committee of conference, and it is important that it should be acted upon at an early period. I hope that my motion to proceed to its consideration when it shall be in order to make the motion will prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not waste the time of the Senate in contending, but I have a word more to say. It is true that the measure proposed to be brought forward by the Senator from Maine is one that ought to be acted upon one way or the other; but in respect of the bill which I ask the Senate to consider, although as my friend from Maine says, it is not true that it is essential in the sense of its becoming a law, that it shall be acted upon and passed at this session, we all know from an experience of almost a hundred years that the nearer in respect of such questions we draw to the time of a presidential election the greater are the difficulties to be encountered in dealing with the subject. Therefore at this session and at this time, when our minds are free from the bias that necessarily surrounds them as we draw nearer and nearer into the excitement of elections, I think the Senate and the House of Representatives ought to act upon the question and if possible regulate by law, whatever it may be, but by some law, the process of ascertaining who the President of the United States is that has been voted for at the election. I hope my honorable friend from Maine, seeing the force of that, will allow the bill to which I have referred to be taken up and considered. It can only occupy reasonably and properly a very short length of time, inasmuch as the general subject has been so much discussed in the Senate in the past few years. Let that be acted upon, and then in respect of his measure, which depends upon simple consideration, there will be no difficulty of action.

Mr. COCKRELL. I fully agree with the Senator from Vermont in the importance of the bill which he has suggested be taken up and considered. But I believe we hold our terms of office for about six years, and have something like six months of this year before us; and I think that we have ample time to take up, consider, discuss, and act upon all the measures which have been suggested, the measure suggested by the Senator from Maine, that suggested by the Senator from Vermont, as well as the measure which is being pressed by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution indicated by him.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask what the order of business is. If this motion is voted down, then the motion of the Senator from Michigan comes up for a vote, I understand. I ask if that is not the next question in order to be voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be nothing before the Senate if the motion of the Senator from Maine is voted down.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the motion of the Senator from Maine should be voted down, then I shall endeavor to get the floor to ask that the measure to which I have referred be taken up.

Mr. FERRY. My answer to the Senator from Kentucky is that if the motion of the Senator from Maine is lost I shall endeavor to obtain the floor for the purpose of having the Senate consider the post-route bill.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish to say that if the pending motion is voted down I shall endeavor to obtain the floor to ask the Senate to consider the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BECK. The reason I asked the question was to regulate my own vote relative to these matters. I shall endeavor to so vote as to bring up the question moved by the Senator from Michigan, and, of course, shall vote against everything that will antagonize that, hoping that when the post-route bill is passed, the measure relative to receiving the legal-tender notes of the country for customs dues, and other things, the resumption question may be passed upon. It was only to know how to vote and what would next follow that I asked the question.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will first vote to allow us to dispose of the matter in relation to the fisheries award.

Mr. BECK. I am sorry to say that I shall endeavor to vote for nothing that will prevent (as the day for adjournment is now so near at hand) the consideration of the financial question and the post-route bill and the remaining appropriation bills.

Mr. KERNAN. I suggest that there cannot be great haste about the financial question. We have got our paper almost to par; and why should there be any such haste to say that we will interfere with it? We passed a bill a few days ago to prevent contraction, to prevent hoarding, by which the greenback currency is not to be contracted a dollar. I think we are getting along very well, taking things in their order.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to go into that discussion now; but there are very many reasons why I desire the financial bill to come up that are satisfactory to my own mind. It was because I wanted to get the information to enable me to vote intelligently that I asked the question that I did. Whether the Senator from New York thinks we have done all we ought to do or not is another question. I do not think we have done half what we ought to do or what the country demands, or half what the majority of the Senate ought to do before the Senate adjourns, relative to this question; and so believing I shall endeavor to get a vote upon the measure.

Mr. BAYARD. There was something said in regard to an understanding of the Senate as to taking up certain measures reported by the majority of the Committee on Finance. I can only say that the Senator from Michigan reported on the 21st of May a bill to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes, and that bill was pressed by the friends of such measures in the Senate without stint or stay; and its consideration was forced, was had, and the bill was passed, although it was not to the convenience of some who desired to oppose its passage. I only say for myself that to promote what I understood to be a measure of satisfaction to those who are standing back of this and kindred measures, at considerable personal inconvenience and without the preparation I desired, I was compelled to speak upon that subject or else be silent on the passage of such a measure, to which I could not consent.

Now, I agree with the Senator from Iowa that no arrangement and that no understanding of any kind exist in the Senate to the effect that there shall be a preference given to one measure after another in the same line. On the contrary, the measure forbidding any diminution in the volume of the legal-tender notes, no matter what amount of national currency was issued, a measure that virtually turned the act of 1875 into an unmitigated act of inflation, provided it can be executed at all, has passed the Senate, and has passed it in very great haste. It was reported on the 21st of May; it passed the Senate on the 27th; and surely there was no delay there. I merely said, as I will say again, that I do not propose to defeat a measure to which I am opposed, by dilatory motions. That is not the way. Whatever is the sentiment of the Senate deliberately expressed must in the end be recorded. All the minority can ask and ought to have, is the time deliberately to express their opposition; but to continue to keep these measures pressing us one after another when so much has been given already, strikes me as unfair. I can only say that the full measure that good faith and mutual convenience require in this case has been accorded to the passage of the act which arrested the existing laws and caused, as I understand from the public prints, a hesitation, not only a hesitation but a failure, on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury under existing laws to cancel and destroy the 80 per cent. of greenback notes which the law required he should cancel and destroy upon the concurrent issue of 100 per cent. of national-bank currency. The consequence was that one million and a half of United States Treasury notes, which under existing law should have been recalled and canceled forever, were stopped under the Secretary's most willing accession to the letter of a law not actually in existence.

I think, therefore, that there was no understanding of the Senate that shall be conclusive as to further measures of this kind; but on the contrary I apprehend there is a general acceptance in the Senate that a measure so extreme as I view this legal-tender enactment, would have been considered at least satisfactory for the time being to those who have been urging such measures.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Delaware did not understand me to have said that there was an understanding on the part of the Senate that this second finance bill should be taken up at once? I made no such statement. I simply said that I would try to obtain the floor for the purpose of securing the consideration of that bill after the post-route bill had been considered. I could not say that there was such an understanding in the absence of the understanding.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator pressed the bill to arrest the further retirement of the legal-tender notes with as much haste and force as he was capable of, and he succeeded in its passage within a week after it was reported from the committee.

Mr. FERRY. That remark has reference to the bill already passed.

Mr. BAYARD. That part of that contract has been duly performed, I am sorry to say.

Mr. FERRY. Does the Senator from Delaware understand that I am stating that there is an understanding on the part of the Senate to take up any measure which I am advocating?

Mr. BAYARD. Not the least on earth. I know there is no understanding, and I would not state an error.

Mr. FERRY. I did press the other measure because it was my duty to do so. The measure was in my charge. The committee had instructed me to report it. Other bills had been taken up. I had the right and I felt it my duty to have that measure taken up. Having done that, and the Senate having passed it, I then gracefully yielded to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, as it is my duty with other Senators to give priority to the appropriation bills unless they stand directly in the way of other equally important measures. I simply wish now to give notice to the Senate that if the motion pending prevails I shall, upon the conclusion of that measure, if the Senate agree to take it up, seek the floor to have the Senate consider the post-route bill, and when that is concluded I shall try to get the floor to have the Senate consider the second financial measure, the bill for the repeal of the resumption act.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I trust the Senate will agree to the motion made by the Senator from Maine, bearing in mind that his proposition is to take up what is an appropriation bill, which ought to be acted upon without delay, and which I believe might have been disposed of during the time which has been occupied in the discussion as to whether we shall consider it or not.

Mr. BECK. If any Senator understood that I claimed in what I said that there was any understanding about the precedence of bills, I desire to assure him that he was mistaken. I only asked the question I did because I desired, so far as I was able, to aid in voting down the proposition of the Senator from Maine and the proposition of the Senator from Vermont or any other proposition that might interfere with the business that I regarded as more important than the propositions pressed by either of them. The fishery award can stand over until next December.

Mr. EATON. By no means.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, it cannot; it has got to be paid by the 1st of next November.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon whether there was an award.

Mr. EATON. It must be paid next November, and the measure must be passed at this session.

Mr. BECK. I supposed it could stand over until then. There is no doubt about our action having effect at that time. Surely, the proposition pressed by the Senator from Vermont will not suffer by being considered at the next session of Congress. I consider that if there is any question that all the people of this country are demanding shall be acted upon it is the financial question, the question suggested by the Senator from Michigan. On the 26th day of November, 1877, the House of Representatives, with a unanimity unparalleled, sent us a bill which it was supposed would receive prompt consideration. It was reported with amendments, which are very good to my mind, not however going to the extent that they ought, by the Committee on Finance of this body, and its consideration has been postponed from that time until now, although urgent efforts have been made by the gentlemen who desire to have a vote upon it to have it considered. One measure looking in the right direction was passed by the Senate the other day. I desire to say that there was no suggestion on the part of many of the friends of the measure now sought to be considered that that was to be regarded as a finality, or that it was to be regarded as satisfactory by anybody who voted for it. Those who differ with me and those who do not want to have any portion of the resumption act repealed, who do not want the legal-tender notes of the country to be received at the custom-house the same as gold, and intend that this matter shall continue to go on and we shall adjourn and do nothing with it, will endeavor to vote it down and throw all the obstacles they can in its way. I, and those who agree with the House in that regard, surely have the same right, if we have a majority in the Senate, to press the measure to a vote at the earliest possible moment. It was to enable me to understand how to vote to accomplish that object, and not to suggest that it either had any precedence over anything else or that anything had been done which threw it out of the way, or that any compromise had been made by the passage of any other bill bearing on this or any other branch of the question, that I desired to state what I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the resolution on the fisheries award.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 30, noes 20.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 21; as follows:

THE FISHERIES AWARD.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution reported by Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the 28th instant:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the views and recommendations embraced in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations touching the award made by the fisheries commission at Halifax are hereby approved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate. The question is on its passage. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is a resolution which like every other is before the Senate in Committee of the Whole, and must have its regular consideration, and its three readings.

Mr. HAMLIN. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a joint resolution?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is a concurrent resolution, which, therefore, must take the ordinary course.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It is not a joint resolution?

Mr. HAMLIN. Concurrent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a resolution that must have the force of law, and it must take the regular stages of consideration, in Committee of the Whole, &c.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator has got the bill—not the pending resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have got what was given to me as the thing taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill accompanies the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Give me the resolution. [The resolution was handed.] Then, Mr. President, I should like to hear "the views" read. I see that this is simply a resolution of the two Houses that the views and recommendations embraced in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, touching the award made by the fisheries commission at Halifax shall be approved. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMLIN on the 28th instant:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President, together with the letter of the Secretary of State and the papers transmitted therewith, relating to the award of the fisheries commission, submit the following report with accompanying resolution and bill:

The commission which assembled at Halifax, in the Province of Nova Scotia, in 1877, met in pursuance of the treaty of Washington to determine a single question, and a question of importance to the United States and the government of Great Britain, and of special and significant weight to the government and people of the Dominion of Canada. That question, to state it as plainly and tersely as possible, was to determine how much the privilege of the inshore fisheries of the Gulf of Saint Lawrence was worth to the American fishermen, over and above what the American market for fish, free of duty or tax, was worth to the Canadian fishermen. It was simply a question of free fishing in all Canadian waters to the American, and of free fish in all American markets to the Canadian, with the right of free fishing to the Canadian in American inshore waters, as specified in the treaty, both for the term of twelve years; and the simple and single point at issue was how much is the privilege accorded to the American worth above that which is granted to the Canadian.

The determination of this question was left under the wise and beneficent provisions of the treaty of Washington to a commission of three persons: Sir Alexander T. Galt, named by Her Britannic Majesty; Hon. Ensign H. Kellogg, named by the President of the United States; and Mr. Maurice Delfosse, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Belgium to the United States, named by the Austrian ambassador at London, in pursuance of the terms of the treaty. After hearing all the evidence and pleadings in the case, two of the commissioners gave an award against the United States of five and a half million dollars, nearly a half million dollars per annum for the twelve years covered by the treaty. Ordinarily an award made by a commission of this character would be paid with the utmost promptness and without the slightest criticism. The principle of international arbitration, so successfully inaugurated under the provisions of the treaty of Washington, is of such vast importance to the peace and prosperity of the nations, and the consequent advancement of civilization, that every proper effort and indeed every reasonable and honorable sacrifice necessary to secure and maintain it should be freely and gladly made. If comments, therefore, become necessary in regard to the award of the Halifax commission, they will be indulged, not as of interest simply to the American side of the question, but of equal interest at least to the British side of the question. In a just and proper disposition of this question the interests of the two nations do not and cannot differ.

Boards of arbitration, like judicial courts, are restricted in their judgments and awards by the jurisdiction that is conferred upon them. If an international board of arbitration transcends its jurisdiction and proceeds in any respect ultra vires, there is, of course, no appeal to interpose as a corrective, except to that of the justice and honor of the nations interested. However much, then, we may regard the award made at Halifax as excessively exorbitant, and possibly beyond the legal and proper power of those making it, your committee would not recommend that the Government of the United States disregard it, if the government of Her Britannic Majesty, after a full review of all the facts and circumstances of the case, shall conclude and declare the award to be lawfully and honorably due. If the unfailing power of self-interest may be feared as a force tending to obscure the view of the British government as to the essential justice of the opposing side, we must remember that in the other direction no nation is more vitally interested than Great Britain in upholding and maintaining the principle and practice of international arbitration; and the intelligence and virtue of the British statesman cannot fail to suggest that arbitration can only be retained as a fixed mode of adjusting international disputes by demonstrating its efficiency as a method of securing mutual justice, and thus assuring that mutual content without which awards and verdicts are powerful only for mischief. In the spirit of these suggestions your committee beg leave to call attention to several features of the award.

The first point claiming attention is that the award was made by only two of the commissioners, Messrs. Galt and Delfosse, the American commissioner, Mr. Kellogg, entering his emphatic dissent from the exercise of exclusive and plenary power on the part of the other two commissioners. Mr. Kellogg was doubtless prompted to this course by the fact that the treaty of Washington in providing arbitrations, one at Geneva, one at Washington, and another at Halifax, specially declared, in the case of the Geneva tribunal and the Washington commission, that a majority should decide. In establishing the Halifax commission no such authority was given to a mere majority of the commission, and no provision was inserted to except the proceedings from the law of arbitration that commonly prevails in England and America; but, in the judgment of your committee, it would not be wise or expedient for the United States to refuse to pay the award on this ground, if the British government, after the subject shall have been brought to its attention, claim that, in their judgment, the award is made in accordance with the terms of the treaty and in conformity with sound principles of law.

The second point of the award to which your committee invite attention is its exorbitant amount, not warranted by any estimate placed upon the value of the inshore fisheries or any negotiations between the two governments. An exhaustive examination of the relative values of free fishing for Americans and free fish-markets for Canadians was made by the agents of the two governments, respectively, anterior to the reciprocity treaty of 1854. It was then virtually agreed to offset the one against the other, and for the period of twelve years, from 1854 to 1866, the mutual interchange of privileges was enjoyed with so great and decided disadvantage to the American fishermen, that their demand for the termination and against its renewal was absolutely unanimous. And so far as the United States was officially advised of the wishes of the Canadians, equal unanimity on their part was found in favor of continuing the reciprocity treaty of free fisheries and free markets. It is true that the provisions relating to the fisheries were coupled with reciprocity in other branches of commerce, but your committee make the statement with special and separate reference to the fishing interests of the two countries. The opinion governing Congress comprehended full knowledge of the fishing interest and of the unanimous desire of the American fishermen to terminate the treaty, and a like desire of the Canadian fishermen to continue it. The suggestion at that time that the United States should continue to admit Canadian fish free of duty, and also pay half a million dollars annually, to secure to our fishermen the privilege of catching mackerel in the inshore waters of Canada, would have been regarded as so unreasonable that it would neither have been proposed nor entertained. And it is but just to say, and to say it with emphasis, that during the twenty-four years since the reciprocity treaty was negotiated, the fisheries have not improved in their resources, whereas the markets in the United States have greatly increased in their value—have nearly doubled. So that free markets to the Canadians, in exchange for free fishing to the Americans, present to-day far greater advantages to the Canadians than they did when they were so ready and so eager to continue the arrangement of 1854.

And it is worthy of special mention that since the treaty of Washington, negotiated in 1871, the government of Great Britain had so little confidence that anything could be awarded in their favor that they were not anxious to have a meeting of the commission, and interposed a proposition for another treaty of reciprocity, which would entirely dispense with the assembling of the Halifax commission. There is good ground indeed for believing that the provision in reference to the fisheries in the treaty of Washington was desired by the British government as an entering-wedge for fresh negotiations in regard to a new treaty of reciprocity. To this end an accomplished agent was sent to Washington in 1873 by the British government, and his labors were aided and supported by the presence of a distinguished Canadian statesman sent hither by the Dominion of Canada. And the treaty of reciprocity which these British agents finally agreed upon with the State Department, and which was submitted to the Senate by the President of the United States and rejected by the Senate, contained again the provision of the former reciprocity treaty of free fishing and free markets; the one being tended by the British agents as a fair and full equivalent for the other. The suggestion of half a million dollars per annum to be paid by our Government for the superior privilege accorded to American fishermen would at that time (1874) have been regarded as wild and extraordinary, as it would also have been at any time since the reciprocity treaty was negotiated twenty years ago.

The returns of custom receipts for four full years—1873 to 1877—since the treaty for the free importation of fish from Canada has been in force, shows that our Government has remitted duties to the Canadian fishermen of nearly a million and a half dollars or nearly $350,000 per annum. Under the Halifax award, our Government is now called upon to pay nearly a half million dollars more per annum for these years, making an aggregate of remission and payment of more than $800,000 per annum, in gold coin, for the privilege of inshore fisheries, the enjoyment of which does not, according to the most reliable statistics, add $25,000 per annum to the profits of American fishermen. In no view can it be double that sum. Were the treaty of free fishing and free markets perpetual in its terms we might find some elements of content, even in the exorbitant award of five and a half million dollars, in the fact that it would remove all possible danger of contention or conflict with a friendly power in a field which has hitherto been involved in difficulties and trouble. But it is not so. This large sum is in consideration of having the fishery question adjusted for the brief space named of twelve years, nearly one-half of which has expired.

But further and in addition to the large sum which has been named, which the United States will be compelled to pay, there is another and important fact to be remembered as bearing directly upon a just decision of the pending question. By the nineteenth article of the treaty of Washington, the right of the inshore fisheries in the waters of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude is secured to the Canadian fishermen in the same manner substantially as is the right to American fishermen in the inshore fisheries of Canadian waters.

But startling as are these figures they do not present the whole case, for it must be remembered, as before stated, that under the treaty the United States remits duties on Canadian fish each year of nearly $350,000, aggregating for the twelve years (allowing a slight increase for each year) the large amount of $4,500,000. This sum which is actually withheld from the Treasury of the United States, and therefore in effect taken from it by the treaty, added to the amount of $5,500,000 makes a total of $10,000,000 which we are called upon to pay for the privilege of American fishermen, making a profit not probably exceeding $25,000 per annum, and cannot possibly equal twice that amount for catching mackerel within the three-mile line of the shore of the Canadian waters named in the treaty. Thus it will be seen that the Government of the United States in effect pays, reckoning interest as low as 4 per cent., an annual sum of $400,000 for the inconsiderable privilege conferred upon American fishermen by the treaty of Washington. Reckoning the interest at 5 per cent. and the annual payment would be just a half million dollars, for that which cannot be in value $50,000. The policy of protecting and encouraging our fisheries was so highly regarded by the founders of our Government, and by those who administered it for seventy years, that large bounties were paid to develop and increase the trade and occupation. The system of our bounties was abandoned some years since, and our fishermen were left to their own energy and enterprise. By the operation of the Washington treaty, in remitting duties, and the Halifax commission awarding an enormous sum against us, the United States is called upon to pay annually a larger sum for the benefit of Canadian fishermen than it ever appropriated as bounties to American fishermen. It may be that American fishermen can prosper without any direct aid from their Government, but they can hardly prosper when the United States is thus made to aid their strongest competitors.

When the British members of the joint high commission of 1871 pressed the fishery question for settlement, the best offer they could get from the American members of the commission was that the United States would agree to pay $1,000,000 for the full and absolute right in common to all the Canadian fisheries in perpetuity. The American commissioners refused to add the admission of Canadian fish free of duty into our markets; and the British commissioners would not agree to any adjustment which did not give the Canadians free entry of fish into the markets of the United States. Finally it was agreed that free fish and free markets should be exchanged, and leave it to be determined by a commission, to meet at Halifax, if anything more should be paid by the United States. The protocols plainly show that the American commissioners were striving sincerely for the settlement of a question that might disturb in the future the harmonious relations of Great Britain and the United States, and did not place a high estimate on the value of the privilege they were seeking to secure for American fishermen. Your committee entertain the opinion that all these facts should be brought to the attention of the British government, with a view to seeing whether, in the light of them, they would claim the award to be a valid and just one, and to see whether in fact the two commissioners who made the award had, first, a legal power and right so to do; and, second, whether in fact they did not take into consideration questions which were not submitted to them; and if such considerations might not really have influenced or governed their award upon their view of questions not before them. When the King of the Netherlands was selected in 1827 as an umpire to decide the point at issue between England and the United States, with reference to the northeastern boundary, the United States did not hesitate to set his award aside, on the plain and justifiable ground stated by Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, that His Majesty had recommended a mode of settlement outside of the facts and terms of submission. Had Messrs. Galt and Delfosse favored the commission, and in that way the United States, with the grounds on which they based their conclusions, it might be shown that they departed as far from the facts and terms of submission as did the King of the Netherlands; and the justice of our setting aside his award, promptly and peremptorily, was never seriously disputed by the government of Great Britain. Your committee therefore recommend that the facts connected with this award be fairly and fully submitted to the government of Her Britannic Majesty.

In the third place your committee would suggest that, in the event of the payment of the award by the United States, the utmost care and circumspection be employed to disabuse the minds of the British and Canadian governments, as well as the British and Canadian people, of any possible impression that the United States or the American people do or ever can accept the award of the Halifax commission as a just measure of the value of the inshore fisheries in Canadian waters. Against such inference, deduction, conclusion, or belief the Congress of the nation, the Senators of the States, and the Representatives of the House of Representatives and of the people, respectfully, but firmly and decidedly, protest. And they do not protest merely from a sense of the injustice that is done in the award, but also and especially because in future negotiations with England regarding trade and commerce between the United States and the Dominion of Canada the Government of the United States will not recognize the award of the Halifax commission as in any sense a just measure of value of the fisheries in question.

Your committee recommend that if its views and conclusions shall commend themselves to the approval of Congress a concurrent resolution shall be passed by the Senate and House; and to that end a resolution is herewith submitted.

And your committee further recommend that the executive department of the United States should be authorized to pay the award if, after correspondence with the government of Great Britain, the President of the United States shall, without further communication with Congress, deem that such payment shall be demanded by the honor and good faith of the nation. And if in pursuance of that conclusion the award shall be paid, that the President shall, as soon as may be thereafter, lay the correspondence with the British government relating thereto before Congress, unless in his opinion it shall be incompatible with the public interest so to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution, which I see is a concurrent one, merely expressing the judgment of the two Houses, as distinguished from the bill which I supposed was the matter taken up, by adding thereto the following words:

And if under the circumstances the government of Great Britain shall receive the sum of money referred to, the provisions of said treaty on the subject ought to be terminated at the earliest time consistent with the thirty-third article of said treaty.

Mr. President, by the eighteenth to twenty-fifth articles of this treaty inclusive, it is provided that for certain fishery privileges within the territorial jurisdiction of Her Majesty's government, a commission should sit to determine how much, if anything, the Government of the United States should pay for the period of ten years from the time the treaty took effect; and it was to take effect by the thirty-third article as soon as the necessary legislation in those respects should be adopted by the respective countries. Then it provides:

Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

The result of that appears to be that this sum of five and a half million dollars is paid for the use of these privileges for the period of ten years, or at the most twelve years, and if the ten years expire and we enter the first day on the next term of ten years, then the duty of raising a new commission and paying for the second ten years arises; so that I think we ought to express the opinion, if we entertain it, as I am sure everbody who hears me does, that this award if you can call it that—I do not wish to characterize it that way, but this so-called award for five million and a half of dollars,—is to be paid as proposed in the view of the committee, ought to be paid if Her Britannic Majesty's government think it is a binding award, but then we ought to say at the same time that the moment we have paid that sum of money we will take an attitude that shall not raise an obligation upon our part to pay another five million and a half or ten million or twenty million dollars that a majority of two out of three commissioners may determine we are to be mulcted in. I wish this declaration of the propriety of terminating this arrangement, which is so greatly to our disadvantage on the whole, to go with the idea that we are to pay at all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, as to whether the so-called award, as he terms it, is in his judgment an award binding upon this government under all the circumstances of the case. He is the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and his opinions on that subject ought to have, as they would have, very great weight. I shall be called upon to vote on this question, and I should like to have his opinion on the subject.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment now, or whenever it is order, so as to call out, if I can, the opinion of the Senator from Vermont after what has been said on the floor by the Senator from Maine and what is said in the report. I shall move to strike out all after the word "Washington," in line 9 of the bill, after it directs the President of the United States to pay to the government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the fisheries commission lately assembled at Halifax in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, and insert:

If the British minister resident at Washington lays before him such evidence as, in the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, renders it certain that the British ministry and the crown lawyers and counselors insist that the award as made was in strict accordance with law and would have been regarded by them as binding and conclusive on the British government if it had been adverse to their claims; and that it shall not direct the payment of any part of the money hereby appropriated until such decision is furnished as aforesaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is to the bill; and the bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I thought it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it is only a resolution expressing concurrence in the view of the committee.

Mr. President, I think I ought to reply to what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has said as he has referred to me particularly, by saying that I do not wish at this moment of time to express any opinion upon the subject to which he referred. Where the rights of a friendly nation are involved, we ought to be very deliberate in respect of forming an opinion upon a topic of that kind, if that friendly nation thinks that an award made in this form is a binding award. Of course the Senator from Delaware is just as well aware as I am of the principles of the common law of England and the common law of the States of the United States derived from the mother country, that no award of arbitrators is an award at all unless it is concurred in by the whole body of arbitrators. That, I take it, everybody will agree is the common law, and always was; and of course we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that with these two common-law nations those principles of the common law must have been in the minds of both the high contracting parties. How far that may be affected by what have been asserted to be the principles of the civil law, which enter in a considerable degree into the intercourse of nations, is an additional and another question which ought to have its weight and be considered when we know exactly what is the extent and boundary of these principles of the civil law to which I have referred. We cannot also shut our eyes to the fact that in this very treaty between these two high powers in respect to two or three other subjects of difference and which were referred to arbitration, it is explicitly provided and agreed that the award of the majority of the arbitrators, or of the tribunal, or whatever name they may be called, shall be binding, when in respect of this article in the same treaty no such provision is inserted. That of course would raise certain implications, or it might be suggested that it would at any rate, (because I wish to speak under great reserve,) in favor of the nation, that whatever might be the general law of nations or the civil law, taking this treaty as the compact and understanding of the parties as it is, the parties had agreed in all the respects that they were willing to agree that the majority as to certain questions should determine the issue, and that they had industriously left this provision to the ordinary principles of common-law arbitration, to be binding and effective only when the whole body of the three chosen persons should concur in the judgment as to what was right.

All those considerations upon all sides, Senators can see the force of; but, as I say, at this present moment I do not wish to express any opinion upon the subject. The committee do not express an opinion. They only say that in their judgment they think it wise, without reference to that question, if I correctly understand the report, to authorize the President of the United States to pay this sum of money if Her Majesty's government demand it; and I do not mean by the use of the word "demand" anything in the least degree offensive or arbitrary, but merely mean if Her Majesty's government express to ours the opinion that they are entitled to receive it.

Mr. HAMLIN. In honor and good faith on our part.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And of course, as my friend says, if they think honor and good faith on our part require it. Well, Mr. President, if the stipulation in the treaty, followed by the judgment of two out of three of the arbitrators, is binding as between two perfectly independent and contracting parties, then we are bound in honor and good faith to pay this money, unless we can show that fraud, or gross mistake which would be equivalent to fraud, has entered into this most extraordinary and exorbitant finding. I do not understand that fraud is imputed to either of the agents of the governments or their administrations, or to any of the distinguished gentlemen who formed a part of the commission. I have not even heard it hinted at. If anything, therefore, it is a great mistake from our point of view, from the point of view of the committee on their report, a great mistake into which this commission has fallen. Whether it is so gross and plain as if it were between private parties would authorize a court of equity to set aside the award, is far from being clear. It was a matter of contest. We said "nothing at all is due" and tried to prevent any finding of any amount. The other side said a great deal more ought to be paid under this treaty and tried to obtain it. In that conflict of evidence and opinion—because it was in a large degree speculative; you cannot count the fishes in the sea—if under such circumstances a board of arbitrators come to a particular conclusion, it would be extremely difficult to say that the mere exorbitance of the sum from our point of view would warrant the setting aside of the award, if it were between private parties; and that argument for setting it aside on that ground would be just as strong if the whole three had agreed to the award. So that it really comes back, so far as honor and faith are concerned, to the question whether as between these two independent parties this stipulation binds us to pay this sum of money, when only two out of the three have said that we ought to pay it. Upon that point, whatever my private opinion may be, I do not propose to express any public opinion at this time in view of the circumstances that I have stated.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, a single word in relation to the amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from Vermont. I think the amendment a proper one, and I trust it will, as I believe it will, receive the united vote of the Senate. The amendment gives notice to Her Majesty's government that if this sum shall be paid by the United States and received by the government of Great Britain we will at the earliest moment possible give that notice which will be requisite to terminate the treaty. The Senator has only anticipated what I supposed every Senator knew would be done at the earliest period of time; for if there be anything susceptible of proof it seems to me to be very clear that the sum awarded for the right which the American fishermen received under that treaty is most grossly exorbitant, and I am sure that I may speak for the fishermen who frequent those waters when I say that they ask not, they seek not, they want not the privilege at any such price. The Senator from Vermont, therefore, has only, and perhaps wisely, anticipated the foreshadowing of that notice which certainly will be given whether this award be accepted or not, paid or not. I cannot doubt that the suggestion contained in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be sure to be adopted at the earliest time. It is wise to intimate it now.

Mr. President, a very few words now in relation to the main subject before us, and I wish to say that the Senator from Vermont has presented the precise view which operated upon the Committee on Foreign Relations in its action so far as concerns the award being signed by but two of the commissioners. In the first place, the treaty is somewhat in the nature of a contract. It is an obligation, the supreme law binding both parties; and surely there was not in the fact enough, in the opinion of your committee, to justify the rejection of the award and a refusal to pay it, because there were but two of the commissioners who signed that award. But your committee refrained from expressing any opinion in relation to its validity or its invalidity. We understood very well what was the common law; we understood very well that the interposition of the civil law might be invoked in behalf of the British government, and we did think that it was a question possessing enough in it for us to consult them in the final determination at which we should arrive. We thought it came very near a question of diplomacy, and that we might wisely and well transfer it to the Executive under such limitations and restrictions as Congress should see fit to impose, and leave the matter to be presented to the government of Great Britain, and then the award to be paid if demanded by that government and the honor and good faith of our own required that it should be paid.

Then, in relation to the extent of damages, the Senator from Vermont has well stated the principles of law that obtain in that regard. Your committee therefore came to the conclusion that it was wise to remit this whole matter to the executive department and allow the executive department to treat with the government of Great Britain in relation to the final settlement of the question, and I cannot doubt that it is the wisest course. We have not, I think, that clear evidence which would justify us in rejecting the result of the commission, and it comes so near a diplomatic question that I am quite sure it will be more wisely treated by the executive department than for us to undertake to settle it definitively.

These were the reasons which obtained. Now if Senators will read the message of the President communicating the documents to us, and the letter of the Secretary of State who has traversed this matter, they will see that the President distinctly recommends that an appropriation shall be made "with such discretion to the executive government in regard to its payment as in the wisdom of Congress the public interests may seem to require." That is the language of the President, and it is in that spirit and for that purpose that the report was drawn and the resolutions herewith submitted approving of its general doctrines. The necessity of this course of action, I think, will be apparent to every Senator. On reading the communication of the Secretary of State the Senate will not fail to observe that almost the precise view of these two questions has been presented to us for our instruction as is presented in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the House and the Senate shall therefore affirmatively adopt that course, it is for the purpose of showing the record of the legislative department in co-operation with the Executive that the distinct resolution approving of the conclusions of this report has been offered. That is the spirit and object in which the action of the committee has been directed, and this is the conclusion at which they have arrived, and I think the country and the world will be satisfied with that action, which I doubt not will be wise and proper, that shall be taken by the Executive when it shall be intrusted to his care.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am disposed to believe that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the proposition which they have made is the correct one; and it goes as far as at present it is well for the Congress of the United States to go. I do not approve of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Vermont, because it seems to me that he is accompanying the offer to pay this award, so large and so unexpected in amount, with phraseology which may be construed into something very like a threat with regard to the rescission of this treaty by the Government of the United States. By the thirty-third article of the treaty to which he has referred, it is provided that:

> This treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislature of Prince Edward's Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

Now, Mr. President, it will not be forgotten that this award and the business to which it related, the vexed question of the right to fish in waters adjacent to the territory of the United States bordering upon the British Possessions, was but one feature of the great treaty of 1871 which was confirmed between the two nations. The main object of that treaty was, as we know, to compose and put at rest forever by the wise and Christian and elevated doctrine of peaceful arbitration, the differences that had grown up between the United States and Great Britain caused by the operations of the confederate cruisers during the late civil war under, as was charged, the countenance and support of the government of Great Britain in her home and her colonial ports. That was the chief question to be composed and settled. The Canadian fisheries were mere incidents comparatively, subsidiary to the great object of the treaty, which was to settle at once and forever not only the losses growing out of what were generically known as the Alabama depredations, but also to banish the ill-feeling that had been engendered in the minds of the American people by the belief that there had been a supposed lack of legality and actual neutrality on the part of the government of Great Britain. There were two arbitrations proposed, the one held at Geneva, whose acts have passed into history, and one at Halifax under the twenty-third article of the treaty, and both have been exceedingly unsatisfactory to the parties against whom the awards were respectively made.

I do not forget, and none of us can forget, the comfortable satisfaction with which the American people received the news that the award of fifteen and a half million dollars had been made in favor of the United States by the Genevese arbitrators. It was met without grumbling; it was paid promptly in accordance with the treaty stipulations by the British government, and the money or its equivalent found its way long ago into the Treasury of the United States, where more than one-half of it yet remains unappropriated. Now comes another feature of the treaty. The Halifax commission was appointed duly in accordance with the treaty; and I must concur with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations in their expressions of great surprise which has been caused by the excessive amount awarded against the United States, while perhaps I may not agree with the proposition of law to be found on the second page of the report of the committee, who say:

> Boards of arbitration, like judicial courts, are restricted in their judgments and awards by the jurisdiction that is conferred upon them.

Most true; but—

> If an international board of arbitration transcends its jurisdiction and proceeds, in any respect ultra vires, there is, of course, no appeal to interpose as a corrective, except to that of the justice and honor of the nations interested.

I scarcely suppose that to be law. I apprehend that if it should be shown that this Halifax commission has acted ultra vires, that they have taken into consideration elements which were excluded, that they had assumed a jurisdiction that was not given them by the terms of the treaty, their award would be absolutely invalid and it would be the right and duty of either party to refuse the performance and execution of an award made in disregard or disobedience to the letter and spirit of the terms of the submission. I do not doubt that; but such is not the present case. Reading as I have with attention the report of the honorable committee, reading as I did the able and interesting letter of the Secretary of State upon this subject as conveyed to us in the President's message, I am unable to find that there was any assumption of jurisdiction by the commissioners ultra vires; but on the contrary their proceedings to hear and determine were regular upon their face and authorized by the terms of the treaty stipulations. I have not yet heard from any quarter that the award of the commission was unauthorized, that they considered elements of damage they had no right to consider or that they embraced facts in their consideration which should properly have been excluded.

The objection is, first, that the very extravagance of their award is unreasonable, makes it unjust per se; that it shocks the sense of proper proportion between the right of fisheries conceded and the amount which is to be paid for it; that a fishery which was not supposed to be worth on the outside more than $50,000 in a year is to be put at a cost of ten times $50,000 in a year. Therefore it is that astonishment may be expressed and may be well expressed at the excessive amount of the award; but that does not touch its legality, its regularity, or the power of the commission under treaty stipulation to make such an award if, in their conscience and judgment, after due examination and deliberation they saw fit to make it.

But another objection arises, formal and technical. It is that the award under the terms should have been signed by all three of the commissioners and agreed to by them all and that there is no express provision that a majority of the commission should have the authority to make the award, but it is suggested that it should be the unanimous action of the entire body of three. Whether this is to be governed by the common-law principle which compels unanimity where a tribunal of any stated number is appointed, or whether it shall be controlled by the general rule relating to public proceedings, that where a board is created in respect of public matters it is competent for a majority to act is a question perhaps arguable. I only can say that the honorable Committee on Foreign Relations have hesitated to assert that the common-law rule should have prevailed in the present case, and unanimity in the commission have been requisite, and that the honorable Secretary of State, whose astuteness and learning in his profession are so well known, has failed to state that he considered or would advise or that the Attorney-General advised that there was a defect patent upon the face of the award which rendered it invalid, and of no binding force upon the party to the submission, sought to be charged with the payment of the serious sum awarded.

No, Mr. President, I think the committee have gone as far as propriety would admit. While I consider we are prefectly at liberty to express our opinions and make the representations of fact which their report contains, and which I do not think can be made without impressing themselves upon any candid and reasonable mind, while I think they have been wise in presenting the questions of fact and law for the consideration of the government with whom we have made this treaty, yet in my judgment no more should be done, except to make provisions for payment in full. The bill provides—

That the sum of $5,500,000 in gold coin be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and placed under the direction of the President of the United States, with which to pay to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the fisheries commission, lately assembled at Halifax in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, if, after correspondence with the British government, the President shall deem it his duty to make the payment without further communication with Congress.

That is a tentative step; I think it is one that can be taken honorably, and taken in the line and in execution of the spirit and intent of the treaty; but I do not think that we should accompany that tender of payment with the suggestion of anything like duress, coercion, menace; "if you do take this money you take it at the cost of the abrogation of the treaty"—or, in the tantamount language of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Vermont. We must not forget that the especial feature of the treaty of Washington was the settlement of the Alabama claims; that they were settled to the fullest pecuniary satisfaction of the American claimants, and of the American Government, and that the award was paid promptly and honorably without comment of any kind or protest by the government found in default by the commission of Geneva.

Now comes another side of the question, and on this we are the debtors. As I frankly say, after what I had read before, after what I have received in the way of information by this report of the honorable committee, I cannot but express my surprise that so great a sum could have been awarded upon a full knowledge of all the facts as a just and reasonable equivalent for so trivial a benefit as apparently has been conceded to the American fishermen. Yet so it was; it was our submission; it was under the same treaty that our citizens obtained indemnity to an amount three times the sum awarded at Halifax, and I hold that the Committee on Foreign Relations has gone as far in the case as is proper for us to go; and that offering to pay this money after there shall have been an opportunity afforded to the government of Great Britain to examine and weigh the grounds of this award and then giving to the President of the United States the opportunity to learn whether there shall be upon the part of the law officers of Great Britain, it may be upon further examination by the law officers of the United States, such legal, valid, conceded objections to the validity of the award, not arising from its exceeding amount alone but also from the absence of unanimity upon the part of the commissioners to whose decision submission was made—then if the President shall be satisfied the money may be paid.

I shall not be willing to vote for the tender of the money with the one hand and this resolution containing something very like menace in regard to the termination of the treaty on the other. The dealings of nations can never be brought down or controlled by the force of technicalities, as may sometimes be those of individuals; and in the present case, considering the treaty of Washington, approving it as I did, I must consider the operations under it as a whole, and therefore in forming a judgment as to the execution of that treaty I will not consider by piecemeal, taking the obligation only on one side as satisfactory, to find fault and break it up after the American people have received and hold to-day in their Treasury full satisfaction for the great object for which the treaty was made.

The amendment of the Senator from Vermont seems to me to resemble too closely a proposition to rescind the treaty in case the other contracting party should insist upon the execution of an article favorable to them and not very palatable to us. I do not wish to see our Government occupy any such position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am quite unable to see the force of the observations of my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in getting out of the amendment that I have had the honor to offer, anything like a menace. What the amendment proposes to do is to express the judgment of the Senate and the House of Representatives, if it shall be agreed to, that the just right reserved to the United States by this treaty to terminate these provisions about the fisheries at the expiration of twelve years, ought to be exercised. How that can be a menace I am unable to understand. If I hire of my honorable friend a house or farm for ten years with a provision that the rate of rent should be fixed by arbitration, and that either he or I at the end of the ten years may terminate the lease by notice, and that if we do not terminate it it shall go on for ten years more, and then the arbitrators should find a sum that was satisfactory to him and not to me, and I on paying over that money should say to him "I pay you this money according to our honorable understanding and also according to the honorable understanding which is in the writing that we have made; but it is my duty to inform you in candor now that I cannot continue to keep your farm after the term is out, any more; the rent is too high." That is all this proposition does.

Mr. BAYARD. May I say to the honorable Senator that he has a perfect right to give me the notice of which he speaks under our arrangement of lease. The United States reserved to themselves, as did the other contracting party, the right to terminate this lease upon two years' notice; but here we are acting under an award which has on this occasion been made against us, and now paying with this reservation is saying, "If you take the money under these circumstances, then we give you notice; we choose therefore to put a price upon your retention of this treaty, that you shall go without this award if you wish to maintain it."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BAYARD. With due respect to my honorable friend, it seems to me it is not proper that the notice should accompany this payment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I had understood my friend to say before, and I was trying to reply to that. We do not say "you cannot have the money without a termination of the treaty;" we do say "Here is the money, which it is very doubtful whether you are entitled to at all, at the very least, because the three gentlemen whom we agreed upon to fix the price, the rent, have not agreed; two of them have agreed; the other has not. In connection with that also the sum which these two gentlemen have agreed upon is, in our opinion, and with our knowledge of the subject, immeasurably, so to speak, extravagant. There is no possible measure by which you can get out of any such result. Yet in the spirit of good neighborhood and friendship we do not stand upon that; we waive both of these questions; take your money; but the honor and candor which should characterize the conduct of individuals and nations obliges us to say now to you, long in advance of the expiration of the ten years and the two, that under such a state of things it is totally impossible for us to go on any more."

This is no menace. Here is your money. We should have the same right to give it if the award had not been made at all; we have the same right to give it at some other time; but inasmuch as the law, and not the President, can give this notice, we must instruct him to do it—he is not the Government—the appropriate time for giving this notice, if we think it ought to be given, is when we provide the money and are expressing the judgment of the two Houses merely upon the subject, to say what we really think; that if this is to be treated as an award without the assent of the three commissioners, if this extravagant and exorbitant sum is to be paid instead of going on to a retrial before other commissioners, which we are quite willing to do—if you say it is all right, then honor and candor require us to say also that exercising the right that the treaty gives us when the time is out we are remitted to our former condition. That is all.

It may be that I am dull in my sensitiveness as to what honor and candor are and what a menace is; but I am quite unable to perceive how there is any menace in such a thing, how there is anything less than the absolute frankness that should characterize the intercourse of nations, in telling Her Majesty's government, on the payment of this money, if she thinks she ought to have it very well; then in a frank way we do just what the treaty expressly says we may do, we say that when the time is out you are remitted to your former rights and we are remitted to ours. That is all there is of it.

I am sure no Senator would wish to do anything which was in the nature of a menace. This is a friendly power, speaking our language. She is in a critical condition at this present moment; and yet if the unhappy time should come when in other respects under this same treaty we have duties to perform, I am sure that we should exercise the most industrious diligence in preserving our honor and fulfilling our faith under the treaty in preserving the absolute neutrality of the United States, so far as any possible act of Congress or of the Government could do it under such circumstances, and that hereafter there shall be no occasion for any subject of Her Majesty's government to complain of the conduct or the neglect of the United States, as there has been occasion for the citizens of the United States, in my opinion, to complain of the conduct of her government on a recent occasion.

That being the state of the case, Mr. President, I am sure that the objection to this amendment that I have offered, made by my honorable friend from Delaware, is rather overstrained, and that instead of this being a menace or out of place, it is exactly what candor and frankness should require us to say.

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question—I did not wish to interrupt him—and that is whether he regards this in the light of a notice at all to the British government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. At this particular moment we are discussing the thing at large. This amendment to this resolution is no notice at all. The Senate is merely called upon to express an opinion in concurrence with the House.

Mr. EATON. It is no notice to anybody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But my friend from Delaware was referring to what might be done on a bill; and I was led into the general discussion. Of course this itself is no notice.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I disagree with the chairman of the committee of which I am a member, in his approval of this amendment. The Senator from Vermont himself says now it is not a notice; it is not operative upon anybody. It has no effect either upon the United States or Great Britain; not the slightest in the world. By the terms of the treaty, it is provided that a notice is to be given at a particular time, not now. Why tell the government of Great Britain, "We will give you notice four years hence according to the terms of the treaty if you take this money?" No, Mr. President, in my judgment this amendment is entirely unnecessary, not to say that it implicates the honor of this country or of Great Britain. It is absolutely unnecessary and can have no effect whatever. It is not a notice. That treaty cannot be terminated until four years' more time has elapsed. If this is not in the nature of a menace, as my honorable friend from Delaware suggested, it certainly is in my judgment entirely unnecessary. Therefore I trust it will not be adopted.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to passing any resolution on the subject of giving notice now or in connection with the matter before us. We must bear in mind that there is no tribunal to which the two governments can submit the question of law which has been alluded to. Each must decide it for itself; and I should be opposed, however clear might be our opinion to our Government deciding that it was not a legal award and refusing to pay. On the contrary, I think the only way consistent with our honor as a Government is to bring the attention of Her Majesty's government to the question of law involved, and if they say that they think this is a valid award according to the terms and intent of this treaty, then I am for paying it. But I am in favor of, frankly and fairly, and without accompanying it with any resolution on the subject as to terminating the treaty, having our Government bring their attention to this question of law. I have a very decided opinion as to whether or not if they had to bring a suit in a court of law in England or here or in a court of equity, they could recover judgment on it. I will not express that opinion now; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to precisely the way in which the case comes before us and to the recommendations of the Secretary of State to the President.

It appears from the papers that in this treaty of the high contracting parties the United States and Great Britain did provide for three arbitrations, one at Geneva, one at Washington, and this fishery commission at Halifax. In reference to the Geneva award and that of the commission to sit at Washington it was expressly stipulated that the decision of a majority of the arbitrators should be final and binding. That was not declared in reference to this fishery arbitration. The commissioner of the United States, when the award was made, brought the attention of the commission and of course brought the attention of the two governments, very properly, to the question. He said:

> And the American commissioner deems it his duty to state further that it is questionable whether it is competent for the board to make an award under the treaty, except with the unanimous consent of its members.

Now, the question is up; and, as I said before, if the British government shall say that they think this is a valid award according to the law of their country and ours, I am for paying it frankly and at once, and then later we can act as to terminating the treaty. But the two governments must decide it for themselves.

What did the Secretary of State invite—and I think very properly invite—Congress to do? Not to consider now (for if he had invited us I should have thought he was in error) whether we will terminate the provisions of the treaty or not, but to dispose of the question arising under this award. After stating the question and citing the opinions of Mr. Blake, minister of justice, in the Dominion Parliament when this question was up—I am saying nothing for myself—the Secretary says, quoting Mr. Blake's remark:

> That the amount of compensation that we would receive from our fisheries—
> Speaking for the Canadian side—
> must be an amount unanimously agreed upon by the commissioners; and that, therefore, we must be willing to accept such compensation as the American commissioner would be willing to concede to us, or we should receive nothing.

Other more or less enlightened expressions of opinion on the other side in England are quoted. The press spoke of the fact that it must be a unanimous award. The Secretary of State, after calling the attention of the President—for it is a communication addressed to the President—says:

> It will be quite competent for Congress in considering an appropriation to meet the proper obligations of the Government under the treaty to waive to insist upon this objection to the validity of the award of the commission for non-conformity to the requirements of the treaty. In the absence of any declaration by Congress adverse to the validity of the award, it will not be the duty of the Executive to raise any discussion with the British government upon this point. If, on the other hand, Congress should accompany the appropriation with an expression of its opinion that the attention of the British government should be drawn to the subject, the actual payment of the award might, so far as this point is concerned, well be made to depend upon the view which that government should maintain as to the meaning of the treaty in this regard. I think it may be assumed that neither the people of this country nor any branch of this Government will desire to seek exemption from a money payment upon any judgment of its own upon a point of this nature under this beneficent treaty, unless it is so well founded as to secure the concurrence of the other high contracting party.

I think this is in the right spirit. I think the duty devolves upon Congress to call upon the President to lay frankly before the other party this question, saying and saying nothing more than this: "If your government feel that this is a binding award under this treaty legally we will pay it and have no words about it." I think we should pass a resolution expressing that sentiment for the guidance of our own executive officers, but I am very averse to accompanying that with anything which might authorize them to declare: "Oh, you say if we take this money you will abrogate the treaty." I think we stand more in accordance with what is our true position by expressing to our own executive officers our concurrence in the views of the committee, as this resolution does, that we will pay this money if the British government insist it is right, and we will say nothing more at this time if they think it is right; and in that way we shall bring fairly and honorably, in accordance with our position as a high-toned government, the question to the attention of the British government. If they exact the money we will pay it, and then we will take care of ourselves in the future by separate action. Therefore I favor the original resolution, which I understand is a response to this invitation of the President in sending us the Secretary's report, and I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 31, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of Wednesday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (S. No. 396) to amend section 2464 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the cultivation of timber on the public domain.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3164) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ESTATE OF S. J. MORRIS.

Mr. VEEDER, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on War Claims the petition of Samuel Morris, executor of S. J. Morris, deceased, asking reimbursement for the amount paid by him for certain real property and furniture purchased by him at a sale made by the United States marshal for the eastern district of Virginia, in the city of Alexandria, under a confiscation proceeding against Dr. Orlando Fairfax, and from which he was ejected by order of the district court; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

MEXICAN AWARD BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that there be a session tomorrow night for the consideration of the Mexican award bill.

Mr. EDEN. We do not want a session for business on Saturday night.

Mr. WILSON. Well, then, this evening at half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BURCHARD. If it is proposed to confine the consideration of the bill to this evening's session, I do not object.

Mr. CHALMERS. I object.

CENTENNIAL BOARD OF FINANCE.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the centennial board of finance asking for relief; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED FRAUDS IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up for action now the bill reported the other day from the Committee on Appropriations appropriating $20,000 to pay the expenses of the committee recently appointed to investigate alleged frauds in the late presidential election.

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection to this.

Mr. GARFIELD. This bill ought to be considered.

Mr. PRICE. What becomes of the morning hour if we take up this bill?

Mr. ATKINS. The bill will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I object.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. There are other matters that have been on the public Calendar a long time and which are more important than this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Oregon was very anxious to adjourn this Congress.

Mr. HALE. The committee are going on now, and the money ought to be provided.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I have no objection to the bill going on the public Calendar; but I object to taking up the last bill on the Calendar first.

Mr. ATKINS. If this money is to be appropriated it ought to be appropriated now. The gentleman can only delay the matter until next Monday; for two-thirds of the House, I doubt not, will then pass the bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the gentleman from Oregon will expedite other matters by objecting to this.

Mr. ATKINS, I am sure he will retard them.

The SPEAKER. The expenditures of this committee are now being taken out of the contingent fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I withdraw my objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 5053) to provide for the expenses of the select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election was read. It appropriates the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the actual expenses necessarily incurred by the select committee of the House of Representatives appointed under resolution of the House of May 17, and under that resolution, and the resolution of May 22 following, directed to investigate alleged frauds in the late presidential election, said to have been committed in Louisiana and Florida, or which may be charged to have been committed in any other State; said appropriation to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, and the Clerk of the House shall pay such parts of said sum as the chairman of said committee shall in writing direct for the purpose aforesaid to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, who shall as soon thereafter as practicable make a report in writing to the House of the manner in which the sums thus paid to him have been expended, accompanied by vouchers in detail; which report and vouchers, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts of the House, shall be deemed a sufficient settlement of his accountability, and any unexpended balance remaining in his hands after such settlement shall be paid by him into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the fund for which it was appropriated.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. HANNA called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 6 voting in the affirmative.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS UNDER PRE-EMPTION LAWS.

Mr. SAPP. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands, for consideration now, the bill (S. No. 138) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws.

The bill was read. It provides that any person who has made a settlement on the public lands under the pre-emption laws, and has subsequent to such settlement changed his filing in pursuance of law to that for a homestead entry upon the same tract of land, shall be entitled to have the time required to perfect his title under the homestead laws computed from the date of his original settlement heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, under the pre-emption laws.

Mr. SAPP. This is a short bill. I hope there will be no objection to its consideration now.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAPP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent to have read and printed in the RECORD a telegram from citizens of Hot Springs, Arkansas.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS, May 28—2 a. m.

To Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the city council to-day. Please read before House:

Whereas there are about five thousand resident population in this Hot Springs reservation who hold their homes, business houses, by uncertain tenure, which fact stagnates all business enterprises, paralyzes our energies, prevents the material growth and prosperity of the city, discomforts visiting invalids; and

Whereas Congress did make an enactment on the 3d of March, A. D. 1877, appointing a commission who should settle the matter of title in an equitable manner, and having spent one whole year and a large sum of money, and completing the main part of work, their term of office expired leaving the work unfinished, and left us in a deplorable condition, a condition which subjects us to great loss, inconvenience, and entails poverty and distress on very many of our citizens; and

Whereas we are fully aware of the wants and wishes of our citizens, and know further that one W. J. Patten and other designing persons are trying to prevent the passage of any bill looking to a speedy settlement of the Hot Springs matter: Therefore,

Be it resolved, 1. That this city council, at the instance and in behalf of the good citizens of Hot Springs, petition and earnestly request Congress to pass the Senate bill now lying on the Speaker's desk and thus authorize the President to appoint or reappoint a commission with instructions to come here speedily, complete the good work begun.

2. That the Senate bill now on the Speaker's desk meets the approval of our citizens, and they earnestly desire its speedy passage.

3. We earnestly entreat our delegation from Arkansas to set themselves at once to work to procure the immediate passage of said Senate bill.

W. H. BARRY, Alderman.
J. H. MALIN, Alderman.
THAD. TAYLOR, Alderman.
AND. S. S. SCHULTICE, Alderman.
S. C. LAW, Alderman.
THOS. BASS, Alderman.

ANNE JANE WENDELL.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5055) granting a pension to Anne Jane Wendell, widow of Tunis D. Wendell, late master's mate United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 3954) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning homesteads.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That where any person capacitated to enter any of the public lands under the provisions of section 2289 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall have actually resided upon and cultivated any lands of the subdivisions in said section mentioned, for the period of one year or longer, under the belief that the same were public lands and subject to pre-emption, but to whom a patent cannot be issued because the said lands are included in grants of lands secured to others under and by virtue of any treaty between the Government of the United States and the government of Mexico, such person may enter a like quantity of unappropriated public land in another locality; and to enable him to receive a patent therefor, the time the said land included in said Mexican grant had been actually occupied and cultivated by him shall be counted as a part of the term of five years required under section 2291 of the Revised Statutes. And when any such person cannot receive a patent for such land occupied and cultivated as aforesaid, because the same had not been surveyed as required by said section 2289, to enable such person to receive a patent therefor, the time the said land had been actually occupied and cultivated as aforesaid, prior to the same being surveyed, shall be counted as a part of the said term of five years.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Is it reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent at this time to report it from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the bill. I do not know that I object to its consideration, if there be opportunity to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a qualified objection.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I can state briefly to the House the nature of the bill, and my statement, I think, will obviate all objections.

Mr. CONGER. This bill will allow any person to squat upon any reservation of the United States or upon any land granted for any purpose and live there undisturbed for one year.

Mr. LATHROP. I object to the consideration of the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill for immediate consideration.

Mr. EDEN. I must object to reporting any more bills for action now.

Several members called for the regular order.

WHITEWOOD FLUME COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-one minutes after eleven o'clock. The House resumes the consideration of the bill pending on Friday last at the expiration of the morning hour, House bill No. 3669, incorporating the Whitewood Flume Company.

Mr. LYNDE. I raise the point of order that this bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. I call attention to the sixth section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this point of order was made on Friday last.

Mr. PRICE. That is true, but the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] who made the point is willing to withdraw it or has withdrawn it. I do not know what point the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to make.

Mr. LYNDE. I do not understand that this point of order has been made before.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair is advised, a point of order was made upon the sixth section on Friday last during the absence of the present occupant of the chair. The point has been withdrawn, or rather the Chair is advised that the gentleman from Colorado will not press it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I desire to state that as the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. KIDDER] is satisfied with the bill I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state the point of order he desires to make against the bill.

Mr. LYNDE. The sixth section provides for granting to this company the use of the public lands; and therefore, under the rule, the bill must first be considered in Committee of the Whole. I would not raise this point if I thought that legislation of this character ought to be adopted by Congress; but this kind of legislation properly comes within the province of the territorial legislation. It is of course impossible for Congress to make all the laws that may be necessary or advisable in the Territories of the United States. Believing that the point of order is sound, I insist upon it.

Mr. PRICE. I do not know that I understand exactly the point of order of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that the bill provides for a grant of the right of way through the public lands of the United States to a corporation.

Mr. PRICE. Then he makes the point that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole because it grants the right of way.

The SPEAKER. That is the point of order.

Mr. PRICE. Then if the gentleman will hear me a moment I think he will withdraw that point of order. This is a company that proposes to dig a ditch not exceeding six miles in length. The parties through whose land it passes have, all of them I believe, asked that this may be done. Their petition is among the papers, and is signed, I believe, by twenty-five or thirty land-owners. Now, if upon this statement of facts the gentleman from Wisconsin still persists in his point of order, then I propose to meet it in a different way.

Mr. LYNDE. I do insist upon the point of order.

Mr. PRICE. Then I propose to amend the bill by striking out all that part of section 6 after the word——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that a point of order made against the consideration of a bill cannot be remedied by an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Well, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order against the consideration of the bill is made too late, for the bill has been read through, and no point of order was reserved.

The SPEAKER. But the point of order was made by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PRICE. But he withdrew it.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the presumption is that if he had not made it the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] would have made it when the bill was first read.

Mr. PRICE. Does the Chair hold that a point of order made and subsequently withdrawn by the party making it is still a point of order against the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would incline to hold that a point of order once made cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, having reported this bill, I desire to say that it only grants, as I conceive, the right of way, and I am not sure that this can be regarded as an appropriation of land. Neither I nor the constituents whom I represent have any interest in this matter personally. Perhaps, as a general proposition, no one concurs more heartily than I do in the statement made by my friend from Wisconsin of his objection to the general principle of congressional legislation for the Territories. But there are reasons why this bill should pass, which seem to influence strongly the gentlemen who are interested in it, and the Delegate from the Territory of Dakota, [Mr. KIDDER,] I understand, desires that this bill should pass. I would therefore be inclined to yield any view I might have upon the general subject of such legislation, and would ask that the objection be withdrawn and the bill be now passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to qualify a remark which he made to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] that a point of order once made cannot be withdrawn without consent, by saying that it cannot be withdrawn without the opportunity being again presented for the point of order to be made by any other member of the House who may desire to renew it.

Mr. REAGAN. I would inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DAVIS,] if the territorial Legislature has not full power to incorporate companies like this? And if so, why do these parties come to Congress instead of applying to the territorial Legislature?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I will say in answer to my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that a territorial Legislature has the power to incorporate companies like this; but those living in the neighborhood think that there would be considerable delay, as the territorial Legislature is not now in session, and I understand will not be in session until next winter.

Mr. CORLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CORLETT. The fact that the territorial Legislature is not now in session does not alter the question at all, because the Legislature of a Territory has not power to grant private acts of corporation. Private corporations can be created only under a general law. I presume that such a general law exists in the Territory of Dakota, and there is therefore no reason why these parties cannot proceed to form a corporation under that general law, and by incorporating themselves in that way all the rights of prior claimants preserved by the general law would be secured. Whether or not they are preserved under the terms of this bill I cannot say.

Mr. PRICE. I will state to the gentleman that all the rights of parties are reserved under this bill.

Mr. EDEN. I would inquire, Mr. Speaker, how this bill gets out of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It was never there. The point of order is now pending that it shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I stand corrected in regard to the power of a territorial Legislature to pass a law incorporating a private company. I have no doubt the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CORLETT] is correct in saying that a territorial Legislature has power only to pass a general act of incorporation.

Mr. LYNDE. The reason why I insist upon my point of order is on account of another provision in this bill which I think is clearly unconstitutional. Therefore I desire that the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole, where the whole bill can be considered. I refer particularly to the provision authorizing this corporation to sue and be sued in any circuit or district court of the United States. I think it is entirely beyond the power of Congress to pass such a provision in regard to a corporation in one of the Territories. At any rate, I think this bill should receive the consideration of the House in Committee of the Whole, where we can consider the propriety of passing such bills for the Territories. I therefore insist upon my point of order.

Mr. PRICE. I do not know that I can change the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] at all; but I will state to him that this bill is copied exactly, word for word and letter for letter, from the charter of a company organized under the laws of the Territory of Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will accordingly be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JEARUM ATKINS.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported the memorial of Jearum Atkins, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

MAILING ALLEGED OBSCENE LITERATURE, ETC.

Mr. BICKNELL, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back adversely the petition of Robert G. Ingersoll and others for the repeal or amendment of sections 1785, 2491, 3878, 3893, and 5389 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to sending through the mails of the United States certain alleged indecent, obscene, and immoral matters, or of supposed immoral tendency; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BICKNELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM T. DUVAL.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 1138) for the relief of William T. Duval.

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the same committee, submitted the views of the minority upon the claim of William T. Duval for work on the Treasury extension.

The bill was laid on the table, and the accompanying reports were ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4006) for the relief of Patrick H. Jones;

A bill (H. R. No. 4235) for the relief of Dennis Looney, of Washington, District of Columbia;

The claim of Andrew Gleason, for compensation for depositing dirt on the White House lot; and

The claim of Stephen Casey, for compensation for depositing dirt on the White House lot.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the orders just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROGERS, RICHARDSON & CO.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2047) to authorize the payment of certain United States notes destroyed by fire, belonging to Rogers, Richardson & Co., of Warren, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. B. FARRAR.

Mr. PHELPS also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 4155) authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to refund to W. B. Farrar, of Whitfield County, Georgia, illegal taxes collected from him in the year 1877; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS KEARNEY.

Mr. PHELPS also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1503) for the relief of Thomas Kearney, late collector of customs for the district of Corpus Christi; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. PHELPS also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1997) for the relief of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

Mr. PHELPS also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 128) for the relief of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue, second district of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEVI PRICE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5056) for the relief of Levi Price; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Levi Price, of Frederick County, Maryland, the sum of $505.13, being amount overpaid by said Price as internal-revenue tax, caused by the deficiency of his still to produce the quantity of spirits for which he was charged. It further directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to said Levi Price by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the sum of $1,740.23, the amount of tax said to be due by him and yet unpaid ascertained to have been overassessed by reason of the deficiency in his still as aforesaid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR SERVICES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from New York who was not present when his committee was called.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to report from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service a resolution authorizing that committee to examine and report upon claims of several individuals for pay for services said to have been performed for the House of Representatives under employment by the late Doorkeeper, John W. Polk. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has had under consideration claims of several individuals for pay for services said to have been performed for the House of Representatives under employment by the late Doorkeeper, John W. Polk, and find that not only in the case of the persons whose claims or petitions have been referred to them by the House, but in the case of a considerable class of persons so employed, there may be equities demanding at least full consideration and examination, in order that the whole, if any, may be disposed of under some proper and general rule.

The committee further find that under the provisions of law neither the Committee of Accounts nor this committee can act on these claims without special authority from the House.

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service would therefore respectfully report the following resolution and recommend its passage, namely:

Resolved, That all claims for compensation for services in the employment of this House under the late Doorkeeper, John W. Polk, be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service with instructions to examine the same and report what legal or equitable obligation to pay the same, if any, has been created by such employment; and, further, to report the amount of any such claims found to be just, with their recommendation in respect to the same, and that said committee have leave to report at any time by resolution or otherwise.

Mr. EDEN. I do not rise to antagonize that resolution, but it strikes me to be a little singular after the Committee on Reform reported a resolution and had it passed to turn Polk out of office they now report another resolution proposing to pay the men illegally employed by Polk.

Mr. HARRISON. The committee have reported no such resolution. There are various claims before that committee and they have thought the true policy was to have the whole matter examined and then let the report come to this House to be acted on for what it is worth. The gentleman knows very well that in the last few days of every session resolutions are brought in to pay persons named when the House does not know what strength they have. The adoption of this resolution will prevent at this session any such thing.

Mr. EDEN. The best way to prevent it will be to turn out from office everybody who is not legally in it.

Mr. HARRISON. We have done that and will do it again.

Mr. EDEN. And then it will not be necessary for such resolutions as this to come in at all.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. JAMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. C. M'BURNEY.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of J. C. McBurney.

The bill was read. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury Department in the settlement of the accounts of J. C. McBurney, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Georgia, to credit him with the sum of $3,895.07, on account of the embezzlement and defalcation of Michael O'Brien of that sum while acting as deputy to McBurney.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. This bill, as well as some other Senate bills which I am about to report from the Committee of Claims, is the unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. EDEN. It is rather a novel idea to refund the money to this collector on account of the defalcation of his deputy unless there be something very peculiar in the case. I understand he has the appointment of his own deputy.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. In regard to that I will say we have adopted the report that came from the Senate and the precedents are just the other way.

Mr. EDEN. Does not this officer have the appointment of his own deputy? It occurs to me if he has, the relief should not be given unless in a very peculiar case. I understand that not only has the collector the appointment of his own deputies but he requires them to give bonds to him for the faithful performance of their duty. I make the point of order. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, the point of order being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of J. C. McBurney, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Georgia, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

This claim was before the Forty-third Congress and reported favorably. The bill has passed the Senate and the facts are set forth in the report of Mr. MITCHELL, from the Senate Committee on Claims, in which he incorporates the report of Mr. DUNNELL made to the Forty-third Congress. We adopt this and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. EDEN. I still insist on the point of order. The report throws no light on the case whatever.

The SPEAKER. As regards the point of order the Chair will state that the bill does not take any money out of the Treasury of the United States. It allows a credit in the settlement of the accounts of a public officer. The gentleman from Illinois will remember that some days ago the Chair alluded to the fact that the rules were defective in this respect.

Mr. EDEN. They ought to be amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, too, and will recognize a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to say that this bill has passed this House once or twice and has passed the Senate. A report was made in the Forty-third Congress upon this case. If ever a just bill came before this House, this is one. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not insist on his motion.

Mr. EDEN. The report which has been read does not show any of the facts.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is an elaborate report from the Senate committee.

Mr. EDEN. If it goes to the Calendar, there will be ample time for the bill to pass before the close of this Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The bill is all right. Let it pass.

The question being taken on Mr. EDEN's motion, there were—ayes 15, noes 58.

So (further count not being demanded) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I am very certain the House has voted upon this question without knowing anything of the merits of the bill. I have discharged my duty in the premises.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have given this case a thorough investigation, and I find it is all right. A committee of this House two years ago reported it favorably.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PHŒBE HENRIETTA GROESBECK.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of Phœbe Henrietta Groesbeck.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Phœbe Henrietta Groesbeck, of San Antonio, Texas, the sum of $300, the same being the amount due her for rent of property occupied under contract by the United States, and for which a proper voucher, now on file in the Treasury Department, was given, and appropriates an amount sufficient to pay the same.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order on this bill that it appropriates money out of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I will only say in regard to this bill that the account is certified by the proper Army officer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The bill appropriates money and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Some time subsequently Mr. BRAGG withdrew the point of order.

The Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of the bill, which was then ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALBERT TOWLE.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 51) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska.

The bill was read.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. SARAH B. FRANKLIN.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1672) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah B. Franklin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

M. E. WALKER.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5057) for the relief of M. E. Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. CUMMING AND OTHERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2716) for the relief of Joseph W. Cumming, Hamilton J. Miller, and William McRoberts; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. COMFORT.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1312, a bill (H. R. No. 5058) in favor of John C. Comfort; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE R. DENNIS.

Mr. HENRY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the bill (S. No. 998) for the relief of George R. Dennis, of Maryland.

The bill was read.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

J. W. BOWLING AND J. S. GOLLADAY.

Mr. HENRY also, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5059) for the relief of J. W. Bowling and J. S. Golladay, of Kentucky, and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM G. FORD.

Mr. HENRY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5060) for the relief of William G. Ford, of Tennessee, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HENRY. The bill makes no appropriation, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS GILBEAU.

Mr. HENRY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a report of the claims allowed by the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General under the act of Congress approved July 4, 1864, not heretofore reported in accordance with the second section of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1876.

Mr. BUTLER. Can that resolution come in under this call?

Mr. EDEN. The law fixes the time when the Secretary of the Treasury shall make his report, and we cannot change the law by a simple resolution of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not a private bill or resolution by any means.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is in relation, though, to private claims.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman from Massachusetts make?

Mr. BUTLER. I claim that it is not a private or a public bill and that it cannot come in under this call; it is a resolution asking for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that point is not necessary to the decision of the question, for the resolution proposes to change the law by a simple resolution of the House.

HEIRS OF JAMES P. M'CLUSKY.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 667) for the relief of the heirs at law of James P. McClusky, deceased.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would remark that this bill is reported back adversely at the request of Mr. GIDDINGS, of Texas, who introduced the bill, and who has ascertained that the claim has already been paid. There is no written report in the case, but it is at his request that we report the bill back adversely. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BERNARD LYNCH.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5061) for the relief of Bernard Lynch; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PETER GALLAGHER.

Mr. WARNER also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2528) for the relief of Peter Gallagher, of Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. MORRIS.

Mr. WARNER also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5062) for the relief of John H. Morris; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DANIEL S. M'DOUGAL.

Mr. WARNER also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5063) for the relief of Daniel S. McDougal; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WARNER. This bill contains no appropriation, and I ask that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The preamble of the bill states that in making allotments of land under the treaty of May 10, 1854, with the Shawnee Indians of Kansas, certain errors arose whereby double allotments were made to certain members of said tribe, which allotments were illegal; that Graham Rogers and Charles Tucker, chiefs of said Shawnee Indians, on September 30, 1869, executed and delivered to Daniel S. McDougal a deed of that date purporting to convey to him, in consideration of the sum of $960, the east half of the northeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 29, township 12, range 23 east, of the sixth principal meridian in Kansas; which deed was made and delivered with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The preamble further states that the consideration so paid by McDougal has been invested and paid out according to law for the benefit of the Shawnee Indians, and no other or further disposition or sale has been made of the land so attempted to be conveyed as aforesaid; and that the supreme court of the State of Kansas has decided that no title could pass by such deed, and that the legal title of said lands is still in said Shawnee Indians. Therefore, in order to perfect the title of said Daniel S. McDougal in and to the lands mentioned, described, and intended to be conveyed in and by the said deed, it is enacted that the said deed of the said Shawnee Indians to Daniel S. McDougal, of the east half of the northeast quarter, and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, of section 29, township 12, range 23 east, of the sixth principal meridian of Kansas, is confirmed and invalidated; and all the title of the United States of America and of the said Shawnee Indians, or any of them, in and to said lands or any part is vested in Daniel S. McDougal, his heirs and assigns forever.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not hear distinctly all of the bill which has just been read. I would inquire if it does not contain a cession of public lands.

Mr. WARNER. It does not.

Mr. HASKELL. It does not refer to the public lands.

Mr. BUTLER. It provides that all the title of the United States to the land mentioned in the bill shall be ceded.

Mr. HASKELL. The land has already been granted and the money paid for it.

The SPEAKER. Where is the legal title now vested?

Mr. HASKELL. Nobody knows where it is.

Mr. BUTLER. It is either in the United States or in the applicant; if it is not in the applicant, then it is in the United States, and this bill cedes to the applicant all the title of the United States to these lands.

Mr. WARNER. The legal title of the land is in the Shawnee Indians; it would have been in the petitioner but for the fact that the deed was defective. This bill simply confirms and validates the deed which was made to McDougal. It is recommended by the Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. BUTLER. I will withdraw the point of order; but I would like to hear the last clause of the bill again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the last clause to be read.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] withdraws his point of order.

The SPEAKER. But the question having been raised, the Chair desires to have the last part of the bill read.

The Clerk read the last clause of the bill, as follows:

And all the title of the United States of America and of said Shawnee Indians, or any of them, in and to said lands or any part thereof is hereby vested in said Daniel S. McDougal, his heirs and assigns forever.

The SPEAKER. On the face of the bill, to which only the Chair can look, there is a cession of such rights to this land as the United States may have. The Chair would think that the bill is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being withdrawn, the question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Pending that motion, I ask that to-day be considered as objection day, inasmuch as last Friday, which was objection day, was taken up by the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. YOUNG. Can I test the sense of the House upon the motion of my colleague [Mr. BRIGHT] by submitting another motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell until he hears the motion.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering one or two bills on the public Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order on Friday, which is private-bill day. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that to-day be considered as objection day in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOOKER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. By unanimous consent, to-day is to be as objection day; and the Clerk will report the first bill on the Private Calendar as of objection day.

WILLIAM M. SPRINGER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3388) for the relief of WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by Mr. BUTLER.

The bill was read.

Objection being made by Mr. HANNA, the bill was passed over.

J. W. BURBRIDGE AND R. N. MONTGOMERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3549) for the relief of J. W. Burbridge and Robert N. Montgomery, reported from the Committee on War Claims by Mr. MARTIN.

The bill was read.

Mr. HANNA called for the reading of the report; which was read.

Objection being made by Mr. HANNA, the bill was passed over.

JACOB CRAMER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1523) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob Cramer, lieutenant of the Pennsylvania Continental Line in the revolutionary war, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims by Mr. BOUCK.

The bill was read.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, called for the reading of the report; which was read.

Objection being made by Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, the bill was passed over.

LOCATION OF LAND SCRIP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 981) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representative, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims by Mr. GUNTER.

The bill was read.

Mr. LATHROP. Is this a private bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes that the question raised by the gentleman should have been raised when the bill was reported to the House from the Committee on Land Claims. The House seems to have referred the bill to the Private Calendar rather than the public Calendar. The Chair sees no reason why it should be considered a private bill, as it refers to the rights of private settlers.

Mr. EDEN. The Committee of the Whole cannot set aside the order of the House which referred this bill to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McGOWAN. The bill pertains to private rights in land scrip; it has nothing to do with the public lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that, as the House decided this bill to be properly referable to the Private Calendar, that order cannot be revoked except by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the bill should be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the public Calendar. It is not a private bill in any sense of the word. The title indicates that it is a public bill; and the bill itself refers to the manner in which certain settlers may procure patents to land.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not make any objection; but it ought to go to the public Calendar.

Mr. LATHROP. I object to the bill.

PHILIP W. STANHOPE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1901) for the relief of Philip W. Stanhope, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. STRAIT.

The bill was read. As proposed to be amended by the Committee on Military Affairs, it provides that Philip W. Stanhope, late captain of the Twelfth United States Infantry and brevet lieutenant-colonel of the United States Army, having been placed upon the list of supernumeraries, from which he was mustered, under the mistake of groundless charges as the superinducing cause thereof, be restored to his proper rank and promotion in the Army, with directions to the Secretary of War, on account of his disabilities incurred in the line of duty, to place him on the retired list, without regard to the limit as to numbers heretofore fixed by law; provided he receive no pay or allowances for the time he was out of service other than that already received at the time of his muster-out.

Mr. BREWER called for the reading of the report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1901) for the relief of Philip W. Stanhope, late captain and brevet lieutenant-colonel United States Army, asking to be restored to his command and put upon the retired list for reasons therein stated, beg leave to report:

That they have duly considered the statements made in the petition of Philip W. Stanhope, and the large number of papers and documents, and proofs accompanying the same, and find the following to be the substantial facts of the case:

That he was appointed captain of the Twelfth United States Infantry on the 14th day of May, 1861; that he served in the field during the entire late war, except the short period he was in Libby Prison, and while he was recovering from severe gunshot wounds; that he was sober and regular in his habits; a skillful and efficient officer; that he was brevetted twice during the war for gallantry in battle, and left a war record that was as honorable to the service as it was creditable to him.

After the war he continued in the service until the 13th of February, 1871, when he was mustered out under the provisions of an act of Congress passed on the 15th of July, 1870, for reducing the numerical force of the Army, including a corresponding number of officers. The eleventh and twelfth sections of said act prescribed two methods of designating the officers that should be mustered out of the military service.

Under the first of these two sections the General of the Army and the commanding officers of the several military departments were required to report to the Secretary of War a list of officers serving in their respective commands that might be deemed unfit for the proper discharge of their duties from any cause, except for injuries incurred in the line of duty. This list when made out was submitted to a board of five officers, organized by the Secretary of War, on whose recommendation the President was authorized to muster out, &c. Under this method, each officer included in the list was allowed to appear before the board and show cause against it. This last provision of the law carries with it as a necessary incident, as your committee suppose, the right on the part of the officer to be notified if he was put on the list on account of any charges affecting his character as such officer, in order that he should have an opportunity to vindicate himself in case the charges should be unfounded.

Now, your committee find from the evidence that the General and the commanders of the several military departments, and who are supposed to be unprejudiced and well acquainted with the character of their subordinate officers, did not include Captain Stanhope among the unfit officers to be mustered out, and it follows, as we suppose, on the other hand, that they deemed him a proper officer to remain in the service. Indeed, we find among the papers and proofs letters of General Ord, commanding his department, indorsing Captain Stanhope as a worthy officer, and having a fine war record, &c.

The second method under the twelfth section authorized the President to transfer officers from the different regiments to the supernumeraries, and from this list to fill any vacancies which might occur in the Army, from any cause, prior to the 1st of January, 1871, and all that should remain of the list after that date should be mustered out. This was done, including Captain Stanhope, who had been put upon the list under circumstances which, in the opinion of your committee, were illegal and against the true intent of the act of Congress, not to say highly injurious to the reputation of a worthy and good officer.

The committee find from the evidence that this officer was placed upon the supernumerary list in consequence of certain false and malicious charges and representations, secretly made near the close of the period in which the list under the law was to be made, seriously affecting his character as an officer, and of which he was kept in ignorance until about a year ago. It is alleged that these charges were preferred by Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace and Major Mizner, of the Twelfth regiment. The evidence shows that these two officers were very unfriendly and hostile to Captain Stanhope for some unknown cause; that Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace, particularly, had been so for a number of years; that he was oppressive toward the captain and subjected him to many indignities. The evidence submitted shows that these charges were the occasion of this officer's being placed upon the supernumerary list, without which he would not have been put there and so mustered out. The evidence also disproves these charges, and shows them to be utterly unfounded.

Your committee are inclined to think that where an officer was to be mustered out upon charges affecting his character as an officer he should have been put upon the list contemplated by the eleventh section, so as to give him an opportunity to defend himself. As this was not done, and as the commanding officers of the different departments passed him over and indorsed him as a competent officer to remain in the service, your committee conclude his muster-out was illegal, unjust, and without the authority of law, and that there should be some remedy for this great wrong they recommend the passage of the amended bill which accompanies this report, and, as amended, they recommend its passage.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

Mr. CARLISLE. I propose to offer a further amendment to this bill which I think will obviate any objection that gentlemen can possibly have to it. The bill, as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, absolutely restores Colonel Stanhope to his former rank and promotion. I propose so to amend the bill as simply to authorize the President to restore him if he shall see proper to do so.

The amendment of Mr. CARLISLE was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "be, and he is hereby, restored," in the seventh and eighth lines, and insert "the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore him."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the papers in regard to the application of Lieutenant Thomas T. Knox, regimental quartermaster First Cavalry Regiment, asking to be relieved from the loss of certain money and property, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That from the testimony and the findings of the board of officers summoned to investigate the loss of certain moneys, commissary stores, and transportation checks claimed to have been stolen from said Lieutenant Thomas T. Knox, regimental quartermaster First Cavalry, at Benicia barracks, California, during his absence in San Francisco, they are of opinion that the money ($147.22) was stolen from the safe of said Lieutenant Thomas T. Knox, and that he had used proper diligence in placing the same in his office safe under lock and key; but they do not think he used the proper care and caution in securing the book of transportation requests or the commissary stores lost.

Your committee therefore, in accordance with the testimony and the findings of the board of officers assembled by order of Lieutenant-Colonel Elliott, commanding post, recommend that the said Lieutenant Thomas T. Knox, second lieutenant

WILLIAM T. MALSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2242) for the relief of William T. Malster, of Baltimore, Maryland, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs by Mr. DANFORD.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William T. Malster the sum of $3,000, said sum having been withheld by the Light-House Board as forfeiture for the non-delivery, within a specified time, of a vessel named Laurel, built at Baltimore by said William T. Malster under contract with said Light-House Board, dated November 24, 1875.

The report, which was read, recites that on November 27, 1875, a contract, dated November 24, 1875, was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury between William T. Malster, of Baltimore, Maryland, and the Light-House Board, for building a twin-screw steamer, authorized by act of March 3, 1875.

Under the provisions of this contract the steamer was to be built and delivered within one hundred and forty-five days from the date of the contract, and the contractor agreed to forfeit for each and every day's delay in completing the work after the time stipulated for the completion thereof the sum of $25 per day as liquidated damages, to be deducted from the sum due him.

Under the terms of this contract the vessel should have been completed and delivered on the 17th day of April, 1876, but she was not delivered until the 15th of August following, being an excess of one hundred and twenty days over the time limited, and involving a forfeiture under the penalty clause of the contract of $3,000.

In evidence that this delay was not occasioned by lack of capacity, proper preparation, due diligence, or liberality on the part of Malster, the committee quote from the letters of the authorities of the Light-House Board, all of whom concur in their testimony as to the good conduct of Malster and recommend that the penalty be remitted and that the board be authorized to pay the contractor the full amount.

J. G. Walker, naval secretary, in his letter of October 11, 1876, to the Secretary of the Treasury, says:

I have the honor to say it appears that the delay was occasioned—

First. By the rejection of timber which appeared to be sound in the rough, but which was found to be unsound by the inspector when worked down to dimensions.

Second. By the unusually hot weather, which prevents men in some instances from working on the interior of the vessel at all, and in others from accomplishing much when they did attempt to work.

Third. By the unusual and unforeseen difficulty experienced in finding hackmatack timber required.

Fourth. By the loss of important castings en route one of which of itself caused a loss of ten days.

Fifth. By the unusual and unforeseen difficulty experienced in obtaining satisfactory working drawings of the machinery.

The board recommend the remission of the forfeiture on these grounds, and because—

First. It is satisfied that it has a better vessel than it would have had if the work had been driven through in haste.

Second. Because the contract was executed in a liberal manner, the contractor doing all that was asked without regard to the exact requirements of the specifications, he showing a wish to have both material and workmanship give satisfaction.

Charles W. Copeland, superintending engineer, in his letter to Professor Joseph Henry, LL. D., chairman Light-House Board, says:

I think the hull of the Laurel is a better hull than if it had been driven through in haste, and that so far the board has profited by the delay. Some delay was undoubtedly caused by the Government inspector's close inspection, and the rejection of all material that was even doubtful. I am of opinion that Mr. Malster tried, personally, to urge forward the work as rapidly as he could, and to complete the contract within the specified time.

J. G. Walker, naval secretary, in his letter of September 19, 1876, also says:

A considerable portion of the delay in finishing her has resulted from circumstances over which the contractor had no control, but this delay has worked no injury or loss to the Government, and the vessel is in every respect better than she would have been had she been completed within the time specified in the contract. It is therefore respectfully recommended that the penalty in this case be remitted, and that the board be authorized to pay the contractor the full amount of the contract.

In his letter of February 8, 1878, Mr. Walker reiterates the above statements and his recommendation that the penalty be remitted.

This testimony establishes the fact the Government did not suffer either inconvenience or loss by the delay, and that the material and workmanship were fully up to the requirements of the contract, and that the delay permitted the greater care which was bestowed on the vessel, and especially that no fault can be attributed to the contractor; therefore, the committee report the bill favorably.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3738) for the relief of B. S. James, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to B. S. James, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums of money as, upon reference to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be found to be justly due and payable to him for transportation of the mails over route No. 5610, between the 1st day of January, 1869, and the 30th day of September, 1870.

Mr. HANNA. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

In 1866 B. S. James became the lessee of the Laurens Railroad Company in the State of South Carolina. In 1867 the Laurens Railroad Company (James being lessee) contracted, by Joseph Crews, its superintendent, to carry the United States mails on route 5610 for $1,200 per annum. In 1869, Crews having been discharged from the superintendency, a controversy arose in regard to the rolling-stock of the road, which resulted in litigation, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, by a letter dated August 19, 1869, informed the claimant that Joseph Crews having written to the department "that H. R. Scott was the owner of the rolling-stock of the Laurens Railroad, and that he (Crews) was his agent, the account of the railroad company cannot be settled until this difference is adjusted between you."

The decision of the court was in favor of claimant, but in the mean time the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the postal year in which the service was rendered was covered into the Treasury. The statement of the account furnished by the Post-Office Department shows a balance due for mail service on that route to September 30, 1870, to the amount of $408.03. The present bill provides that the claimant be paid such sum or sums as upon reference to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be found to be justly due and payable to him for transportation of the mails over said route between the 1st of January, 1869, and September 30, 1870. This is just and reasonable, and the committee report back the bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

COUNSEL FEES IN OSAGE CEDED LAND SUITS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2153) providing for the payment of counsel fees in the Osage ceded land suits, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by Mr. BEEBE, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the tract of land known as the Osage ceded lands, in the State of Kansas, was authorized to be sold, by the first article of the treaty with the Osage Indians, proclaimed January 21, 1867, at not less than $1.25 per acre, and that out of the proceeds of the sale the Government was to be reimbursed $300,000 advanced to said Osage Indians at the date of said treaty, together with the costs of survey and sale of said lands, and other necessary expenses, leaving of the gross proceeds of said sale a balance of about $560,000 to be placed to the credit of the Indian civilization fund; and

Whereas the tract of land aforesaid was claimed by the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company under acts of Congress of the 3d of March, 1863, and July 26, 1866, respectively. These grants covered all the lands, both odd and even sections, so that between these two roads, which run diagonally through the tract from north to south, they were able to take all of the Osage ceded lands save and except one section, leaving an amount wholly inadequate to indemnify the Government the $300,000, or the costs of survey and sale. And the lands covered by these two grants, under a decision of the Secretary of the Interior, were all patented either to the railroad companies or to the State of Kansas for the companies aforesaid; and

Whereas by the joint resolution of Congress of April 10, 1869, these lands were all thrown open to settlement, both odd and even sections, at $1.25 per acre, and Congress thus invited settlers to go upon said lands, and subsequently many of the entries made by these settlers were canceled by the Secretary of the Interior, on the sole ground that the lands belonged to these two railroad companies aforesaid; and

Whereas out of these conflicting interests grew nearly one hundred suits at law between the settlers and the railroad companies, or their representatives; and

Whereas, in 1874, the Attorney-General of the United States, being advised of all these facts, ordered the district attorney of Kansas to institute suits to test the validity of the title of said railroad companies to these lands, and to permit any attorneys selected by the settlers to appear in said cases, and to aid in the institution, prosecution, and trial of said cases; and

Whereas, by virtue of said permission, the settlers did employ Hon. J. S. Black, Hon. William Lawrence, Hon. Wilson Shannon, and Messrs. McComas and McKeighan to appear for them in these cases; and

Whereas these lands were wholly reclaimed by this litigation from the railroad companies, who had paid nothing for them, and restored to the Government as trustee for the Osage Indians, thus enabling said Indians to pay the Government for the money advanced as aforesaid, and for costs of survey and sale, and to increase the Indian civilization fund some $560,000; and

Whereas the Attorney-General remitted and confided to a very great extent the management, conduct, and control of the final litigation to the counsel above named; and

Whereas the result of said litigation was that the Government was reimbursed of all its outlays, without which it would have received nothing, and the Indian civilization fund secured $560,000, without which it could have secured nothing; and

Whereas the settlers have received no benefit from said litigation, save and except the privilege of paying for their land, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, as provided for by the joint resolution of Congress of April 10, 1869: Therefore, to pay said attorneys the balance remaining due and unpaid of their stipulated fees and to reimburse those settlers who have advanced a portion of the money due said attorneys for their services,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the Indian civilization fund, from any of the funds arising from the sale of any of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas, the following sums, to wit:

To J. S. Black, $12,833.33.

To McComas and McKeighan, $12,223.33.

To William Lawrence, $12,633.33.

To Wilson Shannon, his heirs or assigns, $10,383.33.

To William Dick, as treasurer of the Settlers' Protective Association, and trustee, to be by him used to reimburse those individual members of the association who have paid any portion of the counsel fees for services in said litigation, $5,250.

The amendments reported from the committee were as follows:

After the word "sums," in line 6, insert the following:

In full for all claims for counsel fees.

In lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, strike out the following:

To William Dick, as treasurer of the Settler's Protective Association and trustee, to be by him used to reimburse those individual members of the association who have paid any portion of the counsel fees for services in said litigation, $5,250.

The amendments were adopted.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3825) for the relief of Susanna Marble and others, heirs of Abel S. Lee, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by Mr. BEEBE.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay, or cause to be paid, in equal portions, to Susanna Marble, Millie Francis Lee, and John Abel Lee, heirs of Abel S. Lee, or their legal representatives, the sum of $2,915, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 9th day of June, 1872, out of any money due and owing, or that may hereafter become due, to the Kiowa tribe of Indians, on account of any treaty between the said tribe of Indians and the United States; the said payment to be in full of all claims of the said heirs of said Abel S. Lee, and of the amount allowed them by the Indian Bureau for property belonging to said Abel S. Lee, taken and destroyed by the said Kiowa Indians in the year 1872.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1660) for the relief of St. Michael's Church, Charleston, South Carolina, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by Mr. PHELPS.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the collector of customs in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, to remit the duties on bells recast in England belonging to the vestry of St. Michael's church, in the city of Charleston, South Carolina.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM F. WHEELER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3853) for the relief of William F. Wheeler.

The bill was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in adjusting accounts for expenses of courts rendered by William F. Wheeler, United States marshal for the Territory of Montana, to allow credit for the amount of vouchers for disbursements destroyed by fire in the office of said marshal, at Helena, on the 9th January, 1874; said allowance not to exceed the sum of $5,582; provided that before credit be given the marshal shall furnish proof of his losses to the satisfaction of said accounting officers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN TWEEDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3854) for the relief of John Tweedy, postmaster in Danbury, Connecticut, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. WARNER.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to place to the credit of the post-office fund the sum of $215, and directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit said John Tweedy with the said sum, it being the value of the postage-stamps stolen from the post-office in said Danbury on the night of July 2, 1877, without fault of said John Tweedy.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM A. MANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of William A. Mann, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. WARNER.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to William A. Mann, late an acting assistant paymaster in the United States Navy, in his accounts with the Treasury Department, as of the date of the rendition of his final account, the sum of $1,954, moneys of the Government stolen from him, without his fault, while he was in service as such officer.

Mr. HANNA. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

In 1862 the claimant, William A. Mann, was appointed an acting assistant paymaster in the United States Navy, and assigned to duty on the gunboat Baron De Kalb, on which he served until it was blown up and destroyed by torpedoes at the battle of Duvall's Bluffs. Mr. Mann was then assigned to duty on the United States steamer Cayuga, under Admiral Farragut, in the West Gulf blockading squadron, on which vessel he remained until the close of the war, when the vessel was put out of commission and Mr. Mann honorably discharged from the service.

About nine years after his discharge from the service, Mr. Mann was notified by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department that upon a settlement of his accounts he was found indebted to the Government in the sum of $1,954. The account rendered to the Government by Mr. Mann at the time of his discharge showed a balance due the Government of $5,015, and that amount was paid over to the Government at that time, and Mr. Mann states that the amount of money, $5,015, appearing by the account to be due the Government, was the exact amount he had on hand, and thus his account and his cash agreed. The deficiency arises in the following way:

On July 31, 1865, Mr. Mann made a requisition on Paymaster A. W. Russell, United States Navy, for $12,000, which was approved and allowed, and the amount paid to Mr. Mann.

This item of $12,000 is entered on Mr. Mann's account as $10,000, and hence the balance shown by the account to be due the Government is $2,000 less than it ought to be. In settling his account this error of $2,000 was discovered; but a few small items, amounting in all to $46, which Mr. Mann had not claimed, were allowed him, which reduced the amount of the deficiency to the sum of $1,954.

The requisition for the $12,000 was made by Mr. Mann's clerk and the amount receipted for by the clerk and within twenty-four hours of the time when the ship was put out of commission. The account of Mr. Mann was also made out by his clerk. The requisition and the receipt for the $12,000 received of Paymaster Russell and Mr. Mann's account are all on file in the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, in the clerk's handwriting. The false entry of $10,000 instead of $12,000 was therefore made in Mr. Mann's account by his clerk, and the fact undoubtedly is that the clerk did it purposely and corruptly, and thus made the cash agree with the account by putting $2,000 in his own pocket, and that Mr. Mann, finding that the account and the cash agreed, signed it and sent it, together with his books and vouchers, to the Fourth Auditor's Office, satisfied that everything was correct, and without discovering the dishonesty of his clerk. The clerk, after Mr. Mann left the service, went West, where he since died from the effects of excessive dissipation. The Fourth Auditor states that Mr. Mann's accounts are all correct with this one exception.

Under date of January 22, 1876, the Second Comptroller of the Treasury wrote Mr. Mann a letter on the subject, in which are the following passages:

"In reply, I have to say that I have carefully examined your account, and am fully satisfied that the deficit was occasioned through no fault of yours, and yet there is no authority under the law of July 28, 1866, which will warrant the accounting officers in granting the relief asked. The law says expressly the loss of property and funds.

"You cannot be considered as having lost property or funds in that sense, the amount having, as appears from the evidence, been embezzled by your clerk.

"Your only course is to apply to Congress for a bill of relief, which, under the circumstances, I think you will have no difficulty in obtaining."

Your committee are of the opinion that Mr. Mann has been guilty of no misconduct in this matter, that no blame or censure can justly attach to him growing out of this transaction, and that he is justly entitled to the relief for which he asks.

Your committee accordingly report the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

H. H. LEMON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2421) for the relief of H. H. Lemon, member of the Capitol police force, for injuries received while in the discharge of his duties in the year 1870, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENRY.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $3,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of H. H. Lemon, who was injured while in the discharge of his duties as a member of the Capitol police force in the year 1870; and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said sum to said Lemon.

Mr. HANNA. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read as follows:

The said H. H. Lemon was a member of the Capitol police in the year 1870, and on the night of the 27th of August of said year, while engaged in the regular discharge of his duty, in making an examination of the outside of the Capitol to see that all windows, doors, &c., were secure, he stepped upon a trap-door in the pavement on the south side of the east end of the Senate wing, when the door gave way, and he fell fifteen feet or more to the paved floor of the vault below. By this fall he was most seriously injured, and has been permanently disabled, having become totally blind in one eye, deaf in one ear and partially so in the other, besides having, to great extent, lost the use of one side. He has ever since been under treatment by skillful physicians, and has incurred an expense of more than $2,000 in his efforts to regain his sight and obtain relief from his other disabilities, but is still but the wreck of what he was before this accident occurred.

His circumstances have compelled him to sell, at a great sacrifice, his little homestead at Harper's Ferry, and he has a wife, two children, and two sisters dependent upon him for support.

There are several affidavits from reliable sources testifying to his most exemplary character and his faithfulness and efficiency in the discharge of his duties. The trap-door referred to was left insecure by R. M. Hodgson, at that time assistant engineer of the Senate, whose duty it was to see that it was properly secured, and no negligence or fault can be imputed to Mr. Lemon in connection with the accident.

The committee do not feel called upon to enter into any examination of the judicial decisions, if any, applicable to claims of this nature, as this case not only appeals most strongly to the sympathies of Congress, but is sustained by recent legislative precedent, where relief was promptly and properly granted by the act approved July 19, 1876, to the family of John T. King, and to L. B. Cutler, the said King having been killed, and the said Cutler disabled for life, by an explosion of gas in the closet under the eastern stairway of the Senate.

The committee therefore report back the said bill to the House and recommend that it be passed.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

T. A. KENDIG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of T. A. Kendig, of Louisiana, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENRY.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $4,099.44, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay T. A. Kendig for service performed by him in conveyance of the mails from November 1, 1866, to June 28, 1867, on routes No. 8108 and No. 8109, Louisiana, the said service having been duly recognized by the Post-Office Department by orders dated September 18 and September 25, 1867.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ROBERT WARNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3857) for the relief of Robert Warner, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENRY.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Robert Warner, of Washington County, Maryland, the sum of $71.65, being the amount due to him as contractor for carrying the mails on route 3274, in the State of Maryland, from April 1, 1861, to October 21, in the same year.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM HEDGPETH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 967) for the relief of William Hedgpeth, of Paulding County, Georgia, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENRY.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Hedgpeth, of Paulding County, Georgia, the sum of $300, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, being the amount illegally collected from him in 1868 as a tax for the distillation of fruit.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

That the said Hedgpeth was engaged in the business of distilling brandy from fruit, in the year 1868, and prior to the 12th day of October in said year paid a special tax of $300, which was not collected after that date from others engaged in the same business.

At the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress a bill was passed for the relief of Samuel B. Stauber and others, under similar circumstances, and this case is like that of William S. Burgess and others, in which the committee have already reported a bill for relief, except that this claim was not filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prior to June 6, 1873.

For the reasons set forth in the case of Burgess and others, the committee are of the opinion that relief ought to be granted, and therefore report the bill to the House and recommend that it pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM S. BURGESS AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3858) for the relief of William S. Burgess and others, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENRY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas William S. Burgess, William H. Willhite, and Nathaniel Austin, of White County, Tennessee, each paid to P. G. Wilkinson, internal-revenue collector for the third district of Tennessee, the sum of $300 as a special tax for distilling fruit, the said Austin's payment having been made on the 31st day of August and the said Burgess's and Willhite's each on the 8th day of October, 1868; and

Whereas the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 12th day of October, 1868, made an order exempting such distillers from the payment of said special tax: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the said William S. Burgess, William H. Willhite, and to Elizabeth Austin, administratrix of said Nathaniel Austin, deceased, upon proper evidence of her administration, each, the sum of $300, collected from them as special tax as aforesaid.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM H. MERRITT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3257) for the relief of William H. Merritt, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. CUMMINGS, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to allow and pay to William H. Merritt, of the State of Iowa, late receiver and late register of the Fort Dodge land district of Iowa the sum of $3,600 for extraordinary clerk hire and clerical services in his office from the 1st day of November, 1855, to the 1st day of October, 1857.

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

In line 5, strike out the words "receiver and late."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

William H. Merritt bonded as register of the land office at Fort Dodge, Iowa, March 26, 1855. He opened the office for the transaction of business, November 1, 1855, and continued as such register until September 23, 1857. He was called upon to do an immense amount of work growing out of the entries of land both for cash and upon land warrants. He was compelled to employ statedly three clerks, and their labors had frequently to be supplemented by the employment of temporary clerks, such was the rush and demand for land. The accompanying letter from General Williamson, Commissioner of the General Land Office, shows that during Mr. Merritt's term of office the amounts received from the sales of public lands at the Fort Dodge office were $570,944.53. Considerably over one million acres of land were entered during the twenty-three months, a large proportion upon warrants, which greatly increased the labors of the office. To enable him to transact this enormous business the employment of the clerical force stated was absolutely necessary. The salary of the register was $2,500 per annum. He paid all this amount and more for clerical assistance, leaving him nothing whatever for his services.

Under an almost identical condition of affairs Congress by law appropriated the sum stated for each of the offices here named:

Receiver at Kickapoo, Kansas	$3,150
Register at Kickapoo, Kansas	3,553
Receiver at Osage, Iowa (A. K. Eaton)	3,600
Receiver at Osage, Iowa (J. D. Jenkins)	3,600

The accompanying letter states that the business at the Fort Dodge office compares favorably in importance with that done at the Kickapoo and Osage offices, to which extra allowance was made for clerk hire.

The committee believing that Mr. Merritt should, under these circumstances, be allowed a reasonable sum for clerk hire, report back the bill with an amendment to correct a clerical error, and recommend its passage.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1878.

SIR: In reply to your letter of 19th instant, relating to the claim of W. H. Merritt, esq., late register of the land office at Fort Dodge, Iowa, for clerk hire, I have the honor to state—

1st. Mr. Merritt bonded as register 26th March, 1855, and continued in office until 23d September, 1857.

2d. He was paid his maximum salary, fees, and commission during his term of office.

3d. We do not find that any allowance was made him for clerk hire.

4th. The following allowances for extra clerk hire, for services rendered in 1855, 1856, and 1857, were made under acts of Congress, namely:

To the receiver at Kickapoo, Kansas, acts of August 18, 1856, and February 19, 1861	$3,150
To the register at same office and under same acts	3,553
To Mr. A. K. Eaton, late receiver at Osage, Iowa, act July 7, 1876	3,600
To Mr. J. D. Jenkins, late receiver at Osage, Iowa, same act	3,600

5th. The amounts received from sales of public lands at Fort Dodge office during Mr. Merritt's term of office are as follows, namely:

Fourth quarter, 1855	$154,421 13
First quarter, 1856	55,375 79
Second quarter, 1856	52,809 28
Third quarter, 1856	19,426 69
Fourth quarter, 1856	2,594 62
First quarter, 1857	495 55
Second quarter, 1857	282,973 69
Third fractional quarter, 1857	2,847 78
Total	570,944 53

The business at the Fort Dodge office, as indicated by the above figures and for the period referred to, compares favorably in importance and amount with that done at the Kickapoo and Osage offices, to which extra allowance was made for clerk hire, as before stated.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Mr. JNO. B. SMITH,
Clerk to Committee of Claims, House of Representatives.

The amendment of the committee was adopted.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am also authorized by the committee to offer another amendment, in order to make the bill a little more definite. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make the payment hereinbefore required there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,600, which shall be received by the said William H. Merritt in full satisfaction and settlement of all claims or demands against the Government on the part of said William H. Merritt for the clerical or other expenses of his said office.

The amendment was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

M. F. CLARK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2848) for the relief of M. F. Clark, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. CUMMINGS, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to M. F. Clark, the sum of $550, being the value of three horses and one mule purchased of said Clark by Lieutenant E. D. Hillyer, acting assistant quartermaster, and Captain E. J. Barnes, assistant quartermaster, in the year 1864, and paid for to other parties, upon vouchers fraudulently obtained and receipts the signatures to which were forged.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "$550" and insert "$510."

Mr. HANNA. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The facts in this case appear to be as follows:

M. F. Clark was lieutenant Company B, Fifth Kansas Cavalry. His term of service expired in 1864, when he was at Pine Bluffs, Arkansas. Under orders from Major-General Steele, he turned over to the post quartermaster one mule, which he states was received at $175, one horse at $150, one horse at $125, one horse at $60, equipments for said animals, $40. That before the vouchers were made out, and about August 20, 1864, a boat reached Pine Bluffs, and he, with others whose term had expired, was ordered aboard.

Samuel Walker, who was major of the Fifth Kansas Cavalry, testifies that he was president of the board of appraisers which appraised the property mentioned, about August 29, 1864, and that the appraisement was for the amounts above stated.

That Lieutenant Clark never received the vouchers, never disposed of the same, and never received pay for the property sold to the United States, and the amount of $50 is yet due him.

That a voucher in the name of said Clark, dated August 8, 1864, purporting to have been issued by E. D. Hillyer, acting assistant quartermaster, for one mule, valued at $149, was paid by William Myers, assistant quartermaster, at Saint Louis, December 29, 1864, and that the name of M. F. Clark was signed to the receipt attached thereto.

That a voucher in the name of said Clark, dated November 4, 1864, purporting to have been issued by E. J. Barnes, assistant quartermaster, for three horses, valued at $250, was paid by Ingham Coryell, assistant quartermaster, at Saint Louis, June 28, 1865, and that the name of M. F. Clark was signed to the receipt attached thereto.

That the signatures, purporting to be those of M. F. Clark, attached to such vouchers were false, forged, and fraudulent; that M. F. Clark has never received pay for his property so turned over to the United States; that the United States is indebted to him in the amount stated; that a voucher for the $40 for the equipments turned over to the Government has not been presented nor paid; and your committee therefore reduce, by way of amendment, the amount proposed to be appropriated so that the claim for equipments shall not be included.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill (H. R. No. 2848) do pass with the amendment herewith submitted.

The amendment of the committee was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PAUL M'CORMICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 799) for the relief of Paul McCormick, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. CUMMINGS.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, directed to audit and allow Paul McCormick, of Montana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as to them shall seem just and reasonable for the loss sustained by said McCormick by reason of the change made by the officers of the United States as to the place of delivering the wood, after the contract was made and entered into by said McCormick, not to exceed the sum of $1,500, and the same to be in full satisfaction of all claims or demands on account of loss.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES C. REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3860) for the relief of Charles C. Reynolds, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. LINDSEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to place to the credit of the post-office fund the sum of $165; and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department is hereby directed to credit Charles C. Reynolds $165 in his account as postmaster at Milford, Indiana, being for postage-stamps stolen from said office without fault or neglect on the part of said postmaster.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

RICHARD JOSEPH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3861) to reimburse Richard Joseph for money paid on forged vouchers, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. LINDSEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $1,167, lawful money, be, and it hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse Richard Joseph for losses incurred in his office as disbursing clerk of the Department of the Interior, without negligence or fault on his part, through the forgeries of Frederick R. Goodridge, late a clerk in the United States Patent Office.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HANNA. I believe we have laid aside as many bills as we can dispose of to-day, and therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the committee will remain in session at least until four o'clock.

Mr. HANNA. I will wait fifteen minutes and then renew the motion. I withdraw it now.

E. B. HEAD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3832) for the relief of E. B. Head, postmaster at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. LINDSEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to pay E. B. Head, postmaster at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $127, to reimburse him for stamps stolen from his office February 22, 1874; and the proper accounting officers of the Post-Office Department are hereby directed to credit the said E. B. Head in his account as such postmaster with the same.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

E. N. LIVELY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 184) for the relief of E. N. Lively, postmaster at Williamsburgh, Virginia, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. LINDSEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to place to the credit of the fund for the Post-Office Department on money-order account the sum of $387.89; and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department is directed to place the like sum to the credit of E. H. Lively in his account as postmaster at Williamsburgh, Virginia, it being the amount of money-order funds stolen from the said post-office on the night of the 23d of August, 1876.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report. The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 184) for the relief of E. H. Lively, postmaster at Williamsburgh, Virginia, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the evidence that, on the night of the 23d of August, 1876, the post-office at Williamsburgh, Virginia, was entered by some unknown person and robbed of $387.89 which belonged to the money-order account. The house in which the post-office was kept was entered from the rear, the blinds were broken through, the glass removed from the sash, and the latch raised. Entrance having been effected in this way, the lock to the door was taken off by unscrewing, and the chest which contained the money was opened by drawing the staple.

An examination of the premises was made the next morning by several of the most respectable and prominent citizens of Williamsburgh, who have represented to the Post-Office Department that Mr. Lively had taken all reasonable precaution for the safe-keeping of the money, and that he should not, in their judgment, be held responsible for its loss.

It appears that on the 24th of August Mr Lively promptly reported the robbery to the Post-Office Department, that his letter was referred to Isaac Myers, a special agent, for investigation, and that on the 30th day of December, 1876, he addressed to Mr. Lively a communication, which is annexed to and made part of this report, marked A.

Your committee, being satisfied from all the facts and circumstances in the case that Mr. Lively exercised due diligence and proper care in keeping the money referred to and that it would be a great hardship to hold him personally responsible for its loss, recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

A.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF SPECIAL AGENT,
Washington, December 30, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Your petition to the Postmaster-General to relieve you from the loss occasioned by the robbery of your office on the night of the 23d of August last has been received. In reply, I have to say that the relief you seek cannot be given by the Post-Office Department. You must apply to the Congress of the United States, it alone having the power to grant you relief. You can apply through your own or some other member of Congress. I have made a report in the case, in which I state I believe you exercised due caution and care in keeping the funds of your office, &c. If you want to use the petitions you have filed in the Department, I think you can get them.

With reference to the money stolen, I have to advise that it be made good at once. Have it secured by the time your next weekly balance is made up; otherwise I shall be compelled to come down and collect it from your sureties.

If I can be of any service, (officially,) should be glad to represent the case as I find it.

Yours truly,

ISAAC MYERS, Special Agent.

POSTMASTER,
Williamsburgh, Virginia.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NATHANIEL G. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3863) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENDERSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to place to the credit of the post-office fund the sum of $845; and the auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department is hereby directed to credit Nathaniel G. Smith $845 on his account as postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, being for postage-stamps stolen from said office without fault or neglect on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report. The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 853) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, late postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That the petition in this case, which is sworn to by the petitioner and the testimony produced, shows that the said Nathaniel G. Smith was postmaster at Flemington, in the State of New Jersey; that the post-office was kept in a brick building, the most substantial and secure of any in said town; that the office was supplied with an iron safe, in which stamps, funds, and all valuables belonging to the office, as well as valuables to a large amount belonging to said postmaster, were placed for safe-keeping when not in business hours; that on the night of the 12th day of November, 1874, said building, in which the post-office was kept, was broken into by burglars, and the said safe in the post-office was blown open, and postage-stamps to the amount of $845 and other valuables to a large amount were stolen and carried away, and that no part of the same was ever recovered. It further appears that the said postmaster was a prudent and careful officer, and was duly diligent in his efforts to protect and safely keep the property under his care; that the building was supposed to be well secured, and the postage-stamps and other valuables were all placed in the safe, and the safe and doors of the building were securely locked before leaving the office on the night of the robbery, and that no ordinary precaution on the part of the postmaster could have prevented the robbery.

The fact of the burglary is testified to by several gentlemen, including the assistant postmaster, the sheriff of the county, and the judge of the court of common pleas, and is also shown by a petition signed by sixty-three citizens of the village of Flemington. These petitioners also state that said postmaster is known by them to be a prudent, careful, and trustworthy officer of the Government.

Your committee further report that it appears from the affidavit of said postmaster that on the day following the robbery he notified the Post-Office Department of the fact, and on the 17th of the same month forwarded to the Department a detailed statement of the losses.

The Third Assistant Postmaster-General estimates the probable amount of stamps on hand at the time of the robbery at $1,111.64.

Your committee therefore, in view of all the facts, as shown by the papers, report said bill back, with a substitute, and recommend the passage of the substitute.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

H. G. BOARDMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 13) for the relief of H. G. Boardman, postmaster at Milton, Vermont, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENDERSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department be directed to pay to H. G. Boardman, postmaster at Milton, Vermont, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $116 34, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from his office without the fault of the said postmaster.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 13) for the relief of H. G. Boardman, postmaster at Milton, Vermont, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That on the 5th day of March, A. D. 1874, H. G. Boardman was postmaster, and Ebenezer Whitney was deputy postmaster, at Milton, in the county of Chittenden and State of Vermont; that there was no safe or vault in the post-office; but that said H. G. Boardman was a member of the firm of Clark, Boardman & Co., which said firm had a safe, in which the postage-stamps kept by the postmaster were deposited by the said deputy postmaster for safekeeping; and that on the night of the said 5th day of March, 1874, the office of said Clark, Boardman & Co. was entered by burglars, the safe broken open by them, and postage-stamps to the amount of $116 34, placed there by the said deputy postmaster, were taken therefrom; and that said postage-stamps have never been recovered, nor any part thereof.

From the affidavits of the said Horatio G. Boardman, postmaster, Ebenezer Whitney, deputy postmaster, and Jed. P. Clark, member of the firm of Clark, Boardman & Co., it appears that the office of said Clark, Boardman & Co. was a new, strong building, situated in the most public part of the village of Milton Falls, in said Milton and that the safe in which said postage-stamps were deposited was a large, strong iron safe of the Wilder patent; that said safe, as well as the doors of the office, was securely locked and the windows properly fastened; that the office was entered by prying open the window to the office, and the safe was broken open by means of cold chisels, iron bars, hammers, sledges, and other tools.

It further appears that said safe was as secure and safe a place as any there was in the town and was used by said firm of Clark, Boardman & Co. and by a few other people as a place of safe deposit; and that there was no place in said town of Milton, nor near it which was made a place of public deposit, and where said stamps could have been more securely deposited.

The committee further report that no clew to the burglars was ever obtained; and believing from the testimony that said postmaster was not guilty of any negligence, and that said postage-stamps were not lost through the fault or carelessness of the said postmaster or his deputy, your committee report back said bill (H. R. No. 13) and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MERRITT BARBER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2918) for the relief of Merritt Barber, first lieutenant United States Infantry, reported from the Committee of Claims by Mr. HENDERSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow to First Lieutenant Merritt Barber, late assistant quartermaster, United States Army, on his account while acting as such quartermaster at Atlanta, Georgia, the sum of $50.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2918) for the relief of Merritt Barber, first lieutenant United States Infantry, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That from the petition of the said Merritt Barber, accompanying the bill (H. R. No. 2918) for his relief, and from the evidence presented to the committee, it appears that the said Merritt Barber was, in the months of October and November, 1866, post quartermaster at Atlanta, Georgia; and that, in pursuance of his duties as such quartermaster, he took up and reported services in favor of Foster & Dickin, at Griffin, Georgia, to the value of $50, for transportation of quartermaster stores, on a contract to that effect made by Captain E. M. S. Ehlers, Veteran Reserve Corps, who was on duty at Griffin; that vouchers were issued therefor by the said Merritt Barber to said Foster & Dickin, through said Ehlers, receipted by him in blank, and returned in the same manner, and forwarded by said Barber to Captain E. B. Carling, chief quartermaster at Macon, Georgia, for payment. All of which was done in accordance with the instructions for the performance of duties of that character by his superior officer, Captain Carling.

It further appears that afterward said Carling sent to said Barber the sum of $1,568, to disburse for him in payment of receipted vouchers in his hands, of which the vouchers issued to Messrs. Foster & Dickin were specified to be paid; that said money was received on the 24th day of November, 1866, by said Barber, and that on the 26th day of November, 1866, he, in the presence of Captain F. W. Bantern, of the Seventh Cavalry, inclosed a fifty-dollar bill in a letter addressed to Captain Ehlers, at Griffin, in payment of said vouchers to Messrs. Foster & Dickin, and mailed the same at the post-office at Atlanta, Georgia; but it seems the letter was lost in the mail, and was never received by Captain Ehlers.

In July, 1876, it further appears that said Barber was called upon by the Quartermaster-General to explain the matter of the $50, which he did, and, as he supposed, to the satisfaction of that officer, for after considerable correspondence he received a letter dated May 4, 1870, from the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department, advising him that the Second Comptroller of the Treasury had confirmed the settlement of his quartermaster accounts (money), and had returned the same to that office balanced; and the said Barber heard nothing more of the matter until in December, 1876, he was notified by the Third Auditor that upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General a personal charge had been raised against him of $50, the amount of the vouchers issued to Foster & Dickin, but was informed that the fact that the charge had been raised against him was no indication that it was the opinion of the office that he did not remit the money as alleged, although it was said to be out of the usual course of making remittances, and, so far as that office knew, unauthorized; but it was held that under existing laws the accounting officers of the Treasury had no authority to relieve him from responsibility for money lost, and that Congress alone had the authority to grant relief in such cases.

It appears that the amount has been allowed Messrs. Foster & Dickin, and the only question is whether Lieutenant Barber shall be required to make good the loss of the money mailed by him out of his own funds.

The committee are satisfied that Lieutenant Barber mailed the $50 to Captain Ehlers, as alleged, and that he acted in entire good faith in doing so, for it appears that the $1,568 sent to and received by him was received through the mail, and the greater portion of it was disbursed in the same way; and further, that all the receipts of said Barber came to him by mail, and that all disbursements at a distance were made in the same manner and this was the only loss that occurred; and he swears that that was the usual mode of making remittances at a distance and the safest means of communication at that time.

As soon as Lieutenant Barber was advised that the letter and money were not received by Captain Ehlers he notified the postmaster at Atlanta of the fact, and the postmaster set a detective at work and subsequently informed him that it was the opinion of the detective as well as his own that the letter was delivered at the post-office in Griffin.

The committee are of the opinion that Lieutenant Barber should not be charged with this $50, and therefore they report back the bill and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DWIGHT W. HAKES.

The bill (H. R. No. 3557) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes, quartermaster Eighteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, was read.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I desire to substitute for this bill a bill of the Senate, No. 644, for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The Senate bill to which I refer is now before the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The proper way would be for the gentleman to move to lay this bill upon the table, and then ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill indicated, and that it be now considered and passed by the House.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I make that motion and submit that request.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is the Senate bill like this?

An act (H. R. No. 3064) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. MERRIMON in place of Mr. HARRIS, excused, as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3696) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1174) for the relief of Nannie Hall; and

A bill (S. No. 1266) to provide for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial circuit.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUNTON submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3699) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 9, 12, 18, 19, 20, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the words "justices of the peace and," in line 23, page 2.

EPPA HUNTON,
JOS. C. S. BLACKBURN,
G. W. HENDEE,
Managers on the part of the House.
S. W. DORSEY,
J. J. INGALLS,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTON. The main point of difference between the two Houses was upon the mode of appointing justices of the peace, the Senate insisting that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should make the appointments; while the House was in favor of having these officers appointed by the District commissioners.

Mr. DUNNELL. How does this report leave the matter?

Mr. HUNTON. With the President. This change being agreed to, the others followed as a matter of course.

The report was adopted.

GEORGE R. DENNIS.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman upon whose objection the bill (S. No. 998) for the relief of George R. Dennis, of Maryland, was this morning referred to the Committee of the Whole is willing to withdraw his objection. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, in order that it may now be taken up and passed.

There being no objection, the bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George R. Dennis, of Maryland, the sum of $2,394.66, in full payment for damages sustained by him in having his schooner William J. Dennis run into and sunk by the Government steamer General Meigs in the year 1864.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration now.

The bill was read. It provides that the heirs of William A. Graham, late of the town of Lexington, in the county of Rockbridge, and State of Virginia, be relieved of and from all disabilities now existing and preventing them from renewing or reviving an application by the administrator of the estate of William A. Graham, deceased, for a patent for a novel method of extinguishing fires; that such administrator be authorized to renew the application, conforming the same to present rules; and that the Commissioner of Patents be authorized to grant and issue letters-patent for the invention or inventions set forth in such application; said patent, when issued, to have the same force and effect, from and after its date, as though no delay had occurred in prosecuting said application, or in granting a patent thereon, provided that such alleged inventions shall be found to have been new and useful at the time of filing such application, and that all persons or parties having machines containing said inventions, or any part thereof, in use at the time of issuing such patent, shall have the right to continue the use thereof without charge or molestation; nor shall any one be liable for any infringement of the invention of Graham occurring prior to the issuing of the letters-patent therefor.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT COLES.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. Mr. BOONE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1476) for the relief of F. B. Culver. Mr. BREWER. I renew the objection.

MESITA JUANA LOPEZ.

Mr. EWING. I ask that the bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico be taken from the Speaker's table and considered now.

The bill, which was read, provides that the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico known as the Mesita Juana Lopez grant, made by the Spanish government January 18, 1782, examined, approved, and recommended for confirmation by the surveyor-general of New Mexico November 29, 1872, designated as private land claim No. 64, and duly surveyed by the United States, the field notes of the survey and plat being approved by the surveyor-general of New Mexico on February 28, 1877, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; provided that the foregoing confirmation shall only be construed as a quit-claim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States in and to said private land claim, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same; nor shall the United States be liable to make compensation for any part of said land to which there are or may be any adverse rights or claim.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to that.

Mr. EWING. I hope not, as the bill has been considered and reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims of this House.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist on my objection.

NATIVE WINES.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5064) to amend section 3328 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the tax on native wines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MESITA JUANA LOPEZ.

Mr. EWING. I understand, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota who objected to the consideration of the bill to confirm a private land claim of New Mexico has withdrawn it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do withdraw it, as I understand the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House have examined and reported in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee.

HENRY S. FRENCH.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4140) for the relief of Henry S. French, of Nashville, Tennessee, and the same be put upon its passage.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 30, 1878.

SIR: When I was assigned to duty on the committee for investigating frauds connected with electoral vote of the States of Florida and Louisiana, although I was in feeble health, I yet hoped to be able to discharge the duties assigned me. Since then, my health has gradually become worse, so that I fi d myself now quite unfit for the duties which I would be called upon to perform upon the committee. I have been advised by my physician that there is no reason to believe that my health would improve for the present; on the contrary, he has insisted that I must retire for the present from every description of active and severe mental labor. I feel, therefore, with great regret, constrained to resign my position upon the committee, and remain.

Your obedient servant,

THOS. R. COBB.

To Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COBB being excused from further service on that committee, the Chair appoints to fill the vacancy, Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill providing for a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia: Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. WILLIAMS of Michigan, and Mr. HENDEE.

WEST POINT VISITORS.

The SPEAKER appointed, under the law, as Visitors to West Point on the part of the House, Mr. BLOUNT of Georgia, Mr. MANNING of Mississippi, and Mr. FORT of Illinois.

KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an amendment to the act providing for the sale of Kansas Indian lands, approved July 5, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NINTH CENSUS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation of $5,000 for the payment of the expenses of the ninth census; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

And then, on motion of Mr. HANNA, (at twelve minutes past four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, favoring the appointment of practical men in connection with the United States engineers in preparing plans for the improvement of the Mississippi River—to the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River.

By Mr. DAVIS, of California: The petition of the California Academy of Sciences, for the extension of the Signal Service—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HATCHER: The petition of J. F. Edwards, for compensation for services rendered in the Doorkeeper's department, House of Representatives—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. HENRY: The petition of Lieutenant Samuel C. Barney, late of the United States Navy, to be restored to the retired list of the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Resolutions of the Commercial Exchange Association of Philadelphia, favoring an increase of the Army instead of a decrease—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. REED: The petition of Joseph Wescott & Son, for relief from loss arising from mistake in a contract with the United States—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. SCALES: The petition of Joseph M. Wilson, of Washington, District of Columbia, that a portion of the amount received from the sales of public lands be appropriated for the encouragement and support of industrial education in the public schools of our country—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 1, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5053) to provide for the expenses of the select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EUSTIS. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans in favor of modifications in the present contract between the Government of the United States and James B. Eads and his associates, by which he will receive earlier payment from the Government. As this is a subject of great importance and it is necessary that the Senate should take immediate action upon it, and as the resolutions are very short, I ask that they may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection the memorial will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas a bill is now before the Senate of the United States, the title of which is: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875,'" the object of which is to make modifications in the present contract between the United States Government and James B. Eads and his associates, by and under which he will receive earlier payment from the Government for the large amount he has already expended on the work of the jetties at South Pass, and further to be in funds to more rapidly prosecute and promptly complete said works:

Be it hereby declared and resolved by this chamber, 1. That this chamber is fully aware of the large expenditures made by James B. Eads and his associates in the work of jettying the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and of the many difficulties he has had to encounter, especially those of a financial character, owing to the small proportion of payments by the Government as compared to cash outlays, which have far exceeded any estimates made at the time of contract.

Resolved, 2. That in the opinion of this chamber the United States Government can safely and with great justice advance said Eads such amounts as asked for in the bill now before the Senate of the United States, by the modification of the contract as asked for in said bill, or by placing it on the basis of percentage of the work already done, leaving a large sum as a guarantee for the final completion of the work.

3. That it is the opinion of this chamber that the modifications asked for in regard to a diminished width of channel as to depth will in no wise interfere with the requisite depth for purposes of commerce to this port, and will be a source of permanent strength and stability to the jetties.

4. That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and members of the House of Representatives from this State, and that they are hereby requested to give the said bill their active support.

Mr. EUSTIS. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE presented a resolution of the General Assembly of Maryland in the nature of a memorial, urging upon Congress the passage of a law restoring Ex-Lieutenant Samuel Chase Barney to the retired list of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Isaac R. Trimble, of Baltimore County, Maryland, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of J. M. Dyer, of Bushnell, McDonough County, Illinois, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MATTHEWS, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1093) authorizing railroad companies to construct and maintain telegraph lines for commercial purposes, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1284) creating the Utah and Northern Railway Company a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, and granting the right of way to said company through the public lands, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3564) granting a pension to Mrs. Isabell Dunbar, widow of Daniel Dunbar, late first engineer on steamer Victor No. 2, reported it without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1346) to provide for the investigation of the diseases of swine, and contagious and infectious diseases incident to domestic animals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

BUILDING FOR BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 1178, to provide a building for the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department. I will say that I am not disposed to discuss this matter, and I only ask for a vote upon it. I think the Senate fully understand the question, and all I desire is that there may be a vote on the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1178) to provide a fire-proof building for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the mechanical branches of the Treasury and other Departments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any provision for getting a clear title?

Mr. MORRILL. The ground for the site is all owned by Mr. Corcoran, and he offers to sell it for the price named.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but the usual provision where we buy land for a public building is that the deed has to be approved by the Attorney-General, or something of that sort, is it not?

Mr. MORRILL. There is no question about the title here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is rather a slip-shod way of passing a bill without making a provision of that kind; but I do not want to say anything about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. HAMLIN. If we are to act upon the resolution in relation to adjournment, I think the earliest time possible is the most desirable. I therefore move to take it from the table for the purpose of action.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should be obliged to the Senator from Maine if he would allow me to call up a bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us get this up.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is there not a motion pending to refer that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to take from the table the resolution relative to adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate relative to the final adjournment of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to refer the resolution and amendment to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. I withdraw the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. VOORHEES. I certainly saw it reported in the RECORD this morning that the Senator from Minnesota made a motion to refer.

Mr. HAMLIN. He withdraws that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not hear that.

Mr. BECK. I renew that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the resolution and amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Anthony,	Dennis,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Armstrong,	Eustis,	McCreery,	Voorhees,

Chaffee,	Harris,	Ransom,

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives to strike out "June 10" and insert in lieu thereof the words "June 17."

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the words "June 17" and inserting "June 25." I believe that one week more than is contemplated by the resolution is necessary to close our labors here. The 25th will be on Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the amendment of the House by striking out "17" and inserting "25."

Mr. VOORHEES. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MAXEY, (when Mr. COKE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. COKE] is confined to his room by sickness.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Armstrong,	Enstis,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Bailey,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Voorhees.

Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Patterson,
Chaffee,	Harris,	Sharon,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted to refer this subject to the Committee on Appropriations, and I voted against extending the time a week. I think we have now the staff in our own hands, and we had better keep it there. I think we shall be in a better condition next week to consider this resolution than we are now. I move, therefore, that the resolution be laid on the table with a view to take it up next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I am as anxious to get away from here as perhaps any other Senator, and have as little object personally in remaining as any Senator can possibly have, for there is no legislation pending especially interesting to myself or my people that I or they care anything about outside of the general good. But Monday next is the 3d day of June, and we have only two weeks of working days before the 17th, and during the last three days of the session, as I understand it, no bill can be brought before the Senate and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not, may I ask?

Mr. BECK. I understand a bill must be read once each consecutive day and have three consecutive readings. Unanimous consent I suppose cannot be obtained for anything while the Senator from Vermont is present. [Laughter.]

I desire to state the reasons in a very few words why I shall vote against fixing a day for adjournment now. There are at least five important appropriation bills that have not been seriously considered here, and some of them appear as though they were going to require much consideration and give us a great deal of trouble. The West Point bill has been in conference now for a month or more, with very little probability of our being able to get through with it for some time to come. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has just gone back to the House with I believe six hundred or eight hundred amendments—the chairman can correct me if I have not correctly stated it. I know there is a very large number, perhaps a thousand. That must be considered in the House; it has to come back here with the action of the House on those amendments; it has to go to a committee of conference, and after it has passed that ordeal it can hardly be put into shape to be presented to the two Houses in three days for their final action on the report of the conference committee.

The Army appropriation bill has just been laid on the table of the Senate; it has not even been considered by the Committee on Appropriations of this body. That bill ought to have very careful consideration; it changes the present relation and organization of the Army in many regards; it transfers the whole Indian Bureau to the Army of the United States; it makes very many radical changes, all of which have to be carefully considered first by the Senate, then go back to the House with such amendments as the Senate may put upon it, be considered there, and then has to go to a committee of conference and be considered there; and the report of that committee has to be considered.

The sundry civil bill, which embraces many of the largest and most important subjects presented for our consideration, many of them merely arbitrary, depending on our discretion, has not yet been reported to the House. It has to undergo consideration in the House of Representatives and then be brought here to be considered, and go through all the forms and deliberations consequent upon a bill of that character.

There have been a number of small deficiency bills; but there is a large deficiency bill, as I understand, that has not yet been reported to the House. That has to be considered in all its various stages; and so of several others, almost all of equal importance.

It seems to me, after meeting on the 15th of last October, and spending nearly nine months, with more than half of the important legislation of the country undisposed of, legislation involving very many millions of dollars, that it is strange that we are now asked to say that in twelve working days, without having seen the bills which are to come from the House, three of them at least, and there may be many others, requiring great consideration to go through all the forms and all the examinations of committees of conference that we shall end this session. It is tantamount to saying that the Senate deliberately determines not to look at, not to consider these measures; but to put through either under the five-minute rule or under the gag-law matters of the utmost importance to the country that have been postponed on purpose, so that we can have a day of adjournment fixed, and then crowd them through in conference committees without one Senator in fifty knowing what is going on—all that looks to me as if many things were to be done clandestinely, which would not bear the light of investigation or scrutiny.

Besides, we have the river and harbor bill not yet laid before the Senate involving as it came from the House some $7,300,000, and we are advised by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce or the Senator who reported it that nearly a million dollars more has been added to it by the Senate committee, and the Senate has never yet had that measure before it, and is utterly ignorant even of its contents or of the amendments proposed.

There is the post-route bill which we have not yet considered, to which the Senate committee has added subsidies for the Brazilian steamship line, the New Orleans steamship line, to be followed by Pacific mail steamship lines, all to be pushed through under the gag, and no man allowed even to present any opposition to them, as whoever does is to be hooted down as an obstructor of business because the day of adjournment is fixed, and he cannot be allowed to state the valid objections that he may have in the interest of a tax-ridden people to any of the subsidies that are to be put through in that way.

Perhaps more important than all, I think rising above all we have had before us since November last, bills to make the legal-tender notes of the United States receivable for customs dues, bills to repeal the resumption act, both matters of great importance to the country, that the people have been watching for months, hoping for some action to be taken by the Senate. It may be very well for those members of the Senate who do not desire to consider those questions to take this as a convenient way for killing off all that character of legislation, resolving that we will adjourn on a near given day and go home and tell the people that we had not time to consider it. Men who now profess that they are in favor of these things and desire to see the legal-tender notes of the country made equal to gold, may then say "we had no chance to consider it, because it could not be brought up till within four or five days of the adjournment, and then it was crowded out by other very important business," and the President could have pocketed it.

I want to let the people of the country know, so far as my voice has any influence, that the meaning of the Senate's adjourning on the 17th is an utter refusal, an absolute denial to consider those great questions that they have been looking at so eagerly. The Committee on Finance of the Senate placed it before us weeks ago, but we have purposely postponed it, purposely refused to act upon it, and now agree to adjourn in order to keep it from being considered. Whether that is the intention or not, that is the effect of the action proposed, and all men know it.

No Senator will maintain that we can take up the river and harbor bill and consider it; that we can take up the post-route bill with all the attachments to it; go through the legislative, executive, and judiciary appropriation bill; the Army bill, with all its details; the sundry civil bill, with a thousand items squeezed into that; the deficiency bill; and the other bills that are pressing upon us, in twelve days after we have been here nine months and done almost nothing, and maintain that in those twelve days we can either consider or give due weight to the important matters yet behind.

Again, the House of Representatives has before it now and is considering a very important bill relative to internal revenue, in which there will be very many important questions to be considered. It will be before us in a day or two, and in advance of that bill coming here, which we know has been considered there for the last four or five days, we propose to determine that we will adjourn in a few days when we cannot even take it up, however beneficial it may be to the public interest, much less have it duly considered.

For these, and many other reasons which I might give if I had time, I shall vote against fixing the 17th as the day of final adjournment.

Mr. HILL. There is no man in the Senate who is more anxious for an early adjournment than I am, but I shall not vote for this amendment. We must either leave undone the important legislation which we know is pending, or consider that legislation so hastily as to run at least great hazard of doing very great wrong to the country. If I am forced to the alternative of considering a great many bills before this body, hastily or not at all, I shall prefer to consider them not at all. So far as I am concerned, I shall accept a decision by the Senate, if it now votes peremptorily to adjourn on the 17th, as a declaration of our purpose not to consider any legislation before this body, except perhaps the appropriation bills. In the present condition of the appropriation bills before this House and the other, I believe it will take the remainder of this session up to the 17th properly to dispose of the appropriation bills and the questions involved in them; and if we properly consider those bills, and they take all the time, of course we must understand that to adjourn on the 17th is to consider nothing else.

Taking this view of the case, I do feel, as the Senator from Kentucky has expressed it, that it is wrong for this body to say that it will adjourn on the 17th. I do not believe it can wisely consider the measures that ought to be considered, and adjourn on the 17th. While I admit that perhaps there are a great many measures before the Senate and before the House which need not, in view of the good of the country, be considered at all, which I am willing to see not considered at all, still there are a great many measures, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, and others, that I believe ought to be considered, and I believe they ought to be considered deliberately and well, it is utterly impossible to consider them if we adjourn on the 17th.

I therefore have voted for all the motions made looking to a later day of adjournment, because I believe a later day is necessary and proper. Nevertheless, if the Senate shall insist upon adjourning on the 17th, then I shall for one deem it my duty to refuse to consider a great many measures, some of which the Senator from Kentucky has alluded to, because it may be that there is a purpose to hurry through those measures without due consideration, thinking that the measures do not have proper merit and will have a better chance to get through without due consideration than with due consideration.

I shall insist, if we agree to adjourn on the 17th, that the Senate ought to consider alone those measures which are absolutely necessary, such as appropriation bills, and dispose of them; and I believe to dispose of them and dispose of them wisely will take all the time from now until the 17th. But there are other measures that I believe ought to be considered. There are one or two financial measures, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, that I believe ought to be considered. There are some other questions that I think ought to be considered by Congress. I deem it my duty, therefore, to vote for any motion that looks for further time. I think the motion made by the Senator from Rhode Island to lay this measure on the table for the present was a very wise one. The Senate has voted it down, and I suppose we have nothing to do now but either pass or reject the resolution of the House. Under all the circumstances, while I am anxious for an early adjournment, I shall vote against the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I voted to refer this resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, and as the Senator from Rhode Island stated for himself, I voted against fixing the time for the 25th because I think the time ought not now to be fixed at all. If it is to be fixed, it might as well be on the 17th probably as the 25th. I am entirely satisfied that so far as the appropriation bills are concerned we ought not to fix the time to-day. The fortification bill, the consular and diplomatic bill, the Indian bill, and the naval bill, are all the general appropriation bills that have passed. Those bills amount to about $28,000,000. There are now pending in conference the pension bill, $30,000,000; the Military Academy bill, $400,000; the post-office bill, $30,000,000—I speak in round numbers—making over $60,000,000 in conference. The legislative bill, which has just passed the Senate and has gone to the House with amendments, covers about $15,500,000; and as the Senator from Kentucky has said, it contains six or eight hundred amendments. That bill has usually required a very long time in conference, and there is every indication that it will be so this year. The Army bill, amounting to some $27,000,000, has passed the House and been referred to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. The river and harbor bill, amounting to about $8,000,000, is reported from the Committee on Commerce to the Senate, but not acted upon. The deficiency bill may be estimated at somewhere from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000. That has not yet passed the House. The sundry civil bill, amounting to some $17,000,000 usually, last year $17,000,000, has not been, so far as I am informed, reported to the House from the committee. In other words, out of about $160,000,000 to be acted upon at this session we have actually disposed of near $30,000,000, and there are about $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 yet to be disposed of, and, if this resolution is acted on now, there are but two weeks to do it in.

We have on one or two occasions been compelled to take up the sundry civil bill and act upon it within twenty-four hours of the time it came from the House. I remember one occasion, when the time of adjournment was fixed by law—the short session—that the sundry civil bill came from the House to the Senate at twelve o'clock, noon, on Sunday. It was printed and in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations at five o'clock in the afternoon. The Committee on Appropriations went through the pretense of examining it, and reported it back next morning, and it was passed and a law at twelve o'clock next day, covering some $14,000,000.

Mr. President, I do not think that is good legislation, and I am satisfied we shall be driven into the same sharp corner this time if we agree to this date. I am satisfied we shall adjourn earlier if we do not fix the day now than if we do. We shall either be compelled to report those bills from the Committee on Appropriations and act upon them in the Senate without any sufficient consideration, or we shall be compelled to give up some of them. There is absolutely too little time in the two weeks to examine those bills, to act upon them in conference, and dispose of the whole amount that is required with that care and judicious treatment which should be given them. I am therefore opposed to it, and shall vote against fixing the time of adjournment.

Mr. SARGENT. I dislike very much to differ with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, knowing the care he has of such matters and the faithfulness with which he discharges his duties; but I speak from some experience myself in this body and the other in reference to the effect of fixing the day of adjournment upon the appropriation bills.

If we are to adjourn on the 17th, the business of the Appropriations Committee is more than ordinarily far along. Two weeks is a very large time in which to finish up the remainder of the business of the Committee on Appropriations, even allowing a large portion of the time to the ordinary business of the Senate. Every appropriation bill has passed the House except the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill; and the sundry civil bill, although ordinarily called the omnibus bill, makes appropriations usually for matters provided for by law, scarcely ever discretionary items; as, for instance, the lighthouses, the surveys of public lands, the Signal Service, and things of that kind, where there is no division on the principles, but there are only questions of amount which lead to differences. Whenever a principle is not involved, it is very easy for the two Houses to come to an agreement.

The bills which are in conference can be disposed of in a single sitting unless there be some stubbornness on the part of one House or the other as to modifying the existing laws. The pressure of the necessity for the adjournment at a fixed time is always the best solvent for difficulties between the two Houses.

Those who advocate a long session under the idea that we cannot get through with the appropriation bills by the time named certainly are under a great mistake. It must be because there is other business to be attended to. It may be that other business is of great importance. That I do not assume to pass upon. Of course there are differences of opinion as to some of the business proposed, and which would require debate and argument; but the assumption certainly ought not to be acted upon that the Committee on Appropriations cannot easily get through their business.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to ask my colleague on the committee how long some of these bills have been in conference already.

Mr. SARGENT. Because there has been no meeting of the conferees.

Mr. DORSEY. How long? Several months.

Mr. SARGENT. They have been simply neglected and allowed to lie still. That is all. There have been no conferences upon them, or very few. The two Houses have not happened to agree on a time for adjournment, and members meet and talk a little while and find they differ, and then they separate, and in the course of a week or two thereafter they come together again or another committee is appointed.

Mr. DORSEY. I asked my colleague on the committee the question to show that so long as there is no time fixed for adjournment these conference committees will not act at all.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is entirely correct, and I was endeavoring to state the same things.

Mr. WINDOM. In reply to that I wish to say that there are but two bills in conference, one the pension bill, which is an informal matter, and the other is the Military Academy bill, which has been once reported upon by disagreement. So that does not prove anything.

Mr. SARGENT. All the difference on the Military Academy bill which has made this immense trouble is thirty or forty thousand dollars for fixing a hospital and for some drainage at the Military Academy, and I dare say the Senate could retire from its proposition without any loss of dignity, and the House could very usefully allow the appropriation to be made. There is no difficulty about that. The difference upon the pension bill principally is whether the pension agencies shall be at once omitted or whether they shall be omitted in the course of a few months.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to ask the Senator from California—he speaks of delays of conferences—if there had been a day of adjournment fixed would there be any difficulty in getting through with them; and has there ever been?

Mr. SARGENT. I think not. I say, remembering the session to which the chairman of the committee has referred, when we were so much crowded up that it was not merely the sundry civil bill which passed at that time, but on the last four or five days of that session we found some six or seven appropriation bills suddenly forced upon us—I remember that I worked night and day with other members of the committee at that time. I remember standing on my feet here some seven hours at one time passing that very sundry civil bill. That was an extraordinary occasion. We have four times the amount of time now that we had then, to pass a less number of appropriation bills. If you do not fix this time we shall probably not adjourn until August. That is my judgment.

I am in favor of a short session. For Senators who live near by here, who can run home and attend to their business, it is all very nice not to adjourn in a hurry. I do not allude to any particular Senator; but now I have been away from my home in California, my personal business greatly suffering, since the latter part of last September. I want to go home very much indeed. I am staying here simply from a sense of duty. My private business, my private financial business imperatively calls me to the Pacific; and yet I stay here because I do not think, receiving the pay of the people, I have a right to leave for so long a trip during the time that Congress shall remain in session. I am anxious and I know Senators from our coast, members from the West generally are anxious to get away. We are tired here; and if we can do the business by the 17th let us by all means do it.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from California a question rather than to say anything in the way of argument. I ask whether or not, from his knowledge, leaving out altogether the controversy on the important questions that necessarily arise upon the Army bill as it comes from the House, it will not require in his judgment the Committee on Appropriations, if they attempt to inform themselves intelligently about all the changes that have been made by the House to hear, as is their custom, the various heads of bureaus in the War Office, to know whether the action of the House is right, whether the changes proposed should be made? I ask if it will not require any committee of the Senate doing this duty a full week to fully understand what the Army bill is, so as to be able to give their reasons to the Senate for its provisions, especially the change of the Indian Bureau to the War Department? The Senator has had large experience in the Appropriation Committees, and so have I.

Mr. SARGENT. If we are to legislate on all these questions we ought not to adjourn at all until the next session of Congress commences. The duty of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate with reference to these things is very simple. Furthermore the experience we have had with regard to this very subject, over and over again handling this very class of bills, makes the work for the committee very easy indeed. As an old Senator can take hold of business better than a young Senator, so a committee that has been accustomed to handle a particular class of bills know in advance of the consideration what is required, does not need to ask the Departments questions upon which they are about as well informed as the Departments themselves.

Now, it is my judgment that the subcommittee will be able to report the Army bill back to the Committee on Appropriations by next Monday and that a single session of that committee will be able to report it to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the subcommittee on the Army appropriation bill has not yet been called together and perhaps cannot be before Monday morning, if then.

Mr. SARGENT. There has been a good deal of consultation I have no doubt already by the Senator himself and his democratic colleagues on that bill or the features of it and what the duty of the committee is.

Mr. BLAINE. There will be no delay in reporting the Army bill to the Senate. Of course I cannot speak of what delay there will be in the Senate, but there will be none in reporting the bill to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I am thoroughly satisfied, after a pretty long experience, as the Senator from California has had, that if the Senate Committee on Appropriations is not to be of any use at all, it may be, and doubtless perhaps it ought to be, abolished, and let the House committee make any report they please and the Senate act upon it; but if this Senate committee is to be of any use to the Senate, if it is to be able to tell them why the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department should be made, if it ought to be able to tell the Senate why the Army ought to be twenty thousand or twenty-five thousand or why the pay ought to be cut down, it is the business of the House Appropriation Committee when the House has seen fit to change the existing condition of things to make appropriations in accordance therewith. They have put such clauses in the appropriation bills and they come to us and they are referred to the Committee on Appropriations here. I say it is certainly the business of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to examine all these things. If the House of Representatives in the exercise of its right has inserted things in those appropriations bills that more properly belong to other committees, which committees might be better able to dispose of them and do so more rapidly, and if the Senate sends them to the Committee on Appropriations, where they require more consideration and take more time and give more trouble to the Committee on Appropriations than they would to the other committees if that legislation was not so inserted in the appropriation bills, then when they are sent to the Committee on Appropriations, whether rightfully or wrongfully, those questions have all to be considered. Such questions are in the Army bill now, are sent to us, and have to be considered.

There is a clause in the Army bill, passed by a very decided majority of the House, denying the use of the Army to enforce writs in the hands of marshals of the United States or their power to call on them as a posse comitatus under the election laws passed years ago. Those laws and the practices under them have had very serious consideration in the courts of the country and elsewhere, and the Committee on Appropriations ought to look carefully to see how far the marshals of the United States and the Attorney-General of the United States or any civil officer of the United States can summon the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus to control State elections in the interest of anybody. That provision is in the bill. It has to be considered, and seriously considered. It must be considered by the committee to whom it is sent, although perhaps the Judiciary Committee might in the first place have been more proper to look into all these questions.

Now, sir, anxious, as I said I am, to leave this city, having remained here as long as the Senator from California has done to the same neglect of private business, having never run home or been absent either from the Senate or any of its committees for a day or an hour, and while I should be glad to get away to-morrow, yet I feel as he does that my public duty requires me to stay, and believing that public duty imperatively requires that these and other questions should be more carefully considered than it is possible for the committees of the Senate so as to be of any use at all to consider them in the limited time proposed, I think it is impossible to consider them in twelve days, far less to give to other questions the consideration they deserve.

Mr. MAXEY. My friend the Senator from Kentucky replied to a sotto voce suggestion made by me, which was, "What has the Appropriations Committee to do with the reorganization of the Army?" The point which I designed to make by that remark to him was that that is a question of the gravest consideration for the Committee on Military Affairs of this body. Why, sir, there sat in England for two years, from 1838 to 1840, a commission, of which the Duke of Wellington was chairman, on military and naval affairs. Admiral Cockburn and General Hardinge were members of that commission. It sat on one single point for two years, and yet here is a proposition to reorganize the Army as organized since the first Congress of the United States, and to do it through the Appropriations Committee.

Hence, I say that the remark which was made by the Senator from Maine occurs to me to be a very wise one, that it will take but very little time for the Appropriations Committee to report that bill back.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to say to the Senator from Texas that while of course I am not at liberty to speak officially, and have not yet been authorized to do so for the Committee on Appropriations, I do not think the committee have the least idea of assuming to themselves the function of attempting to reorganize the Army. They do not believe it is within their jurisdiction, and they will make no attempt to do it whatever.

Mr. MAXEY. I respectfully submit that if the Committee on Military Affairs has to pass upon the recommendation or rejection of a nomination for a second lieutenant, and from that on up to the Secretary of War, and here is the gravest of all possible questions relating to the Army—its entire reorganization after an existence of eighty years—if the Military Committee is to be ignored in that, then you had just as well abolish that committee. That is my judgment about it. It is not the business of the Appropriations Committee to take charge of such matters. I grant you that so far as appropriating one nickel is concerned the Committee on Military Affairs has nothing to do; but when it comes to the reorganization of the Army, that is the proper committee to have charge of the matter, and I would assume on behalf of that committee that it would not for one moment consider that its duty to the Senate was faithfully discharged if it were to take that up and report in two weeks or two months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the question which has just been before the Senate is in the highest degree one of privilege, and is therefore one which will necessarily supersede the unfinished business. It is wise that we settle the question now. If we postpone it until to-morrow morning the same debate will have to be gone over then. We have listened this morning to the same speeches that I have listened to for thirty long years. There has not been an adjournment of this body fixed at the long session ever within my experience when we have not had the precise arguments we have listened to here this morning; and I therefore hope we shall proceed to settle this question at this time, and I have no objection that the regular order shall be laid aside informally for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside and the Senate continue the consideration of the adjournment resolution. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senate, as I understand, has not yet agreed to continue the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to lay the present order on the table. Then we can take it right up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to take up the adjournment resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, on the 17th of April the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations offered the original resolution providing for adjourning the two Houses on the 10th day of June. That resolution was agreed to I believe unanimously, certainly without a division. It went to the House of Representatives, where it has been held. Meantime both Houses have been going on diligently with the appropriation bills and other necessary business, and a good deal that is unnecessary, I will add. In that state of things the House has proposed an amendment to postpone the adjournment until the 17th of June, which, of course, must be to us conclusive evidence that in the judgment of the House of Representatives so far as it is concerned it will be ready to adjourn on that day. The question therefore simply is whether in the present state of the appropriation bills and the other indispensable business, if there be any, the time that is left is probably sufficient. To my mind it obviously is. As the Senator from Maine has said, we never get on about harmonizing differences on the appropriation bills so long as there is an indefinite time in advance for that purpose. When it is known by the gentlemen representing both Houses that the thing must be disposed of by a certain day, then their differences almost without exception are always readily harmonized. It will be just so now. Suppose, however, it is not, suppose that one body or the other should insist that the Government should not be supplied with money to carry on its operations unless the other House—whichever might then insist—should agree to some new provision of law, and an appropriation bill should break down? The President of the United States, charged with the faithful execution of the laws, would find it his duty to execute his constitutional prerogative of calling the two Houses together instanter, at no expense to the public. There is no travel or per diem or any other additional expense whatever involved. So, looked at in its most dangerous aspect, it appears to me there is no ground whatever for postponing this day.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am anxious for an early adjournment, as early as can take place consistently with our duty to attend to the public business. I feel as certain as I can feel of anything that we cannot get through with the business that ought to be transacted by the 17th of June. To say nothing about the appropriation bills which are behind, there are other measures that ought to pass at this session of Congress and that must be passed very soon if we adjourn on the 17th. I therefore move to amend by striking out "Monday" and inserting "Saturday" and striking out "17th" and inserting "22d."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 35.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the House amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I only want to say a single word, and that is in reply to my friend from California, who speaks of the manner in which he has labored heretofore at the close of sessions to get the appropriation bills through. I am well aware of it, Mr. President, and I want to pay this tribute to the Senator from California, to say that I know of no man in the Senate who can endure more hard labor than he can, or who has performed more; but it is for the very purpose of avoiding that sort of thing that I do not desire to have the time fixed for adjournment. The last two or three nights of the session are usually passed without any consideration of the bills really, but they are hurried through, they are pulled through by main strength, and there is no discussion about the bills. The Senator from California has performed a great deal of that kind of honorable service. But sitting up three or four nights in succession, as we always do when we fix the day of adjournment, we pass upon millions and millions of appropriations without giving careful consideration, without any examination in the committee or in the Senate or anywhere else, and I know of one or two occasions in which the sundry civil bill has been carried by the armful to the President, and without any reading, without ever his reading it, without all the items even being included in the bill, it has been signed and fixed up by the committees afterward, after Congress had adjourned. I hear it said that was at a short session. So it was, and we want to adopt the same principle here by fixing the time two weeks ahead, and we are seldom further behind at the short session than we are to-day. I know of one case in which the sundry civil bill was passed in the way that I have described. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says I ought not to tell of it. I have nothing to conceal on these subjects. It was a matter that was made necessary by the situation, by the condition of the public service, and by the fact that the day was fixed for adjournment, and I speak of it in order to avoid the same evils this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did the President faithfully support the Constitution and sign a bill in that way?

Mr. WINDOM. I have nothing to say in regard to the President's duty on the subject. I only say that thing was done. The Senator from California says the sundry civil bill is not a discretionary bill. I think the Senator had forgotten its items when he said that. There is no bill that is considered by the Senate containing so large a proportion of discretionary items or that requires a more careful study and consideration by the proper committee of the Senate. It covers all the outlying service of the Government. It is that class of items and that sort of service that is not provided for anywhere else, and is generally not provided for by law, but is discretionary almost entirely. I think four-fifths of the items contained in that bill of $14,000,000 or $17,000,000 are discretionary. But I have nothing more to say about it. I will do the best I can to try to get it through.

Mr. SARGENT. We never can adjourn without fixing a day; Congress never adjourns at the long session without fixing a day; and it is the universal experience of Congress that the last three days of the session are crowded with business. Any one who looks at the statute-books will find that on the day of adjournment the great bulk of the bills are marked as approved by the President; fully one-half of all the bills that pass Congress are approved on the last two days of the session; and a very large portion of that number is approved on the last day. It is so now, will be so forever, and always has been so. Most of the appropriation bills are approved on the last day. You fix the time a fortnight ahead and it will be so; you fix the time three months ahead and it will be so, because Congress will attend to other things till the actual necessity of action on the appropriation bills is obvious. I am in favor of fixing an early time in order that the labors of the Committee on Appropriations may be determined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House to strike out "June 10" and insert "June 17."

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question until Monday, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCREERY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 31; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCREERY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THURMAN, (when his name was called.) I have just been informed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is unwell and has requested me to pair with him on this question, which I have agreed to do. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL. I agreed to pair with the Senator from Illinois yesterday on the post-route bill. Has there been a new arrangement made?

Mr. HEREFORD. That is another matter entirely.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from West Virginia requested me to pair with the Senator from Illinois on this question, and I have done so.

Mr. HEREFORD. It is another matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 38, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—38.

WASHINGTON LOW GROUNDS.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to dispose of a motion which I entered yesterday to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 542) to provide for the conveyance of the low grounds, in the city of Washington, under the provisions of the act of Congress, chapter 95, approved May 7, 1822, was passed. Yesterday, after the bill had passed, it occurred to me that there might be something behind it, not apparent upon the face of the measure, which might be injurious to the interests of the Government. I therefore moved to reconsider the passage of the bill with a view to examining more closely the object for which it was passed. I have done so; I have examined the memorials which originally came in the case, and have examined the acts of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States under the act of 1822. I am satisfied that there is now, at all events, but one single person interested, as far as the papers show, in getting a deed for any of the lots sold by the commissioners under the act of 1822. I therefore desire to offer an amendment to the bill covering the case of that individual, and if that be adopted upon a reconsideration, there is no reason why the bill should not pass. I ask, therefore, that the motion to reconsider be agreed to unanimously that I may offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to considering the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed? The Chair hears no objection, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is on the third reading of the bill, pending which the Senator from Maryland offers an amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to strike out all after and including the word "execute" to the end of the bill and insert:

Under his hand and official seal execute a deed to the proper legal representative of the late Thomas Hughes for such lot or lots of ground to which he or she may be entitled under the act of Congress aforesaid, when it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the full purchase-money for said lot or lots has been paid, and the conditions of improvement complied with, and that the party is otherwise entitled to such deed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be reported in full as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the powers and duties heretofore in and by the third section of the act of Congress, approved May 7, 1822, to wit, chapter 96, of the first session of the Seventeenth Congress, devolved upon and vested in "the mayor of the city of Washington for the time being," be, and the same hereby are, vested in and devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior, who shall under his hand and official seal execute a deed to the proper legal representative of the late Thomas Hughes for such lot or lots of ground to which he or she may be entitled under the act of Congress aforesaid, when it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the full purchase-money for said lot or lots has been paid and the conditions of improvement complied with, and that the party is otherwise entitled to such deed.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT JUSTICES AND CONSTABLES.

Mr DORSEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of the justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 9, 14, 18, 19, 20, and 21; and

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the words "justices of the peace and," in line 23, page 2.

S. W. DORSEY,
J. J. INGALLS,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EPPA HUNTON,
JOS. C. S. BLACKBURN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to make a brief explanation of the report.

Mr. DORSEY. The point of disagreement between the two Houses was chiefly upon the mode of appointing justices of the peace in the District of Columbia. The bill as it came from the House originally provided that these officers should be appointed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The Senate amended that by requiring their appointment to be by the President of the United States, and their confirmation by the Senate, as other officers are appointed. The Senate also increased the number from ten to fifteen. I think those were the only real amendments to the bill made by the Senate. But the Senate receded from none of its amendments adopted, the House receded from all its disagreements.

The report was concurred in.

THE FISHERIES AWARD.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. HAMLIN from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 28th instant:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the views and recommendations embraced in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations touching the award made by the fisheries commission at Halifax are hereby approved.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS, to add at the end of the resolution:

And if under the circumstances the government of Great Britain shall receive the sum of money referred to, the provisions of said treaty on the subject ought to be terminated at the earliest time consistent with the thirty-third article of said treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Several Senators called for a division.

Mr. BLAINE. I observe that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not in his seat. I wish if he were here that he would withdraw the amendment, because an adverse vote upon the amendment, stated in that way, might give rise to the presumption that the Government of the United States is adverse to terminating this treaty. I do not myself desire to have any declaration made about it; but I should dislike very much to have any inference drawn that the Government of the United States in any way approve that treaty or would be willing to be bound by it in the future, when we have the right by the treaty itself to terminate it.

Mr. KERNAN. Could not the amendment be withdrawn for the present?

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I would suggest, if the Senator from Vermont were in his seat. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] states that he has sent for him. I would a great deal rather have it reserved. I see the force of the objections made yesterday to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. KERNAN. We can act on it separately at another time.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] inform me, if he pleases, what will be done after agreeing to this resolution? I have read the report two or three times. If we concur in the recommendations made, what will be effected by it?

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. Suppose we agree to this resolution, "that the views and recommendations embraced in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations touching the award made by the fisheries commission at Halifax are hereby approved," what is accomplished by that after we agree to it? What is the final result of it?

Mr. HAMLIN. I tried to state to the Senate yesterday the precise object it would accomplish. I will endeavor to state it again.

Mr. BECK. I assure the Senator I overlooked it if he did.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator, if he has read the communication from the Secretary of State which accompanies the President's message——

Mr. BECK. I have read it carefully, twice.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator then has noticed that the Secretary of State raises the precise two questions which are discussed in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. That being the view of the executive department of the Government, the passage of this concurrent resolution will express the sentiment and opinion of Congress in concurrence with the Executive. That is all there is in it. We express our objections to the award. We suggest that it shall be the duty of the President to bring not only that question to the consideration of the British government, but also the other question, whether an award signed by two of the arbitrators is legal and valid and binding. The object of this resolution is to express the opinion of Congress in concurrence with that of the Executive, I suppose, as we may regard the letter of the Secretary of State as expressing the opinion of the Executive, thus placing the action of Congress upon the same ground that the Executive has placed it, that to be followed by a bill appropriating the money.

Mr. BECK. I asked the question because after a careful reading of the report I came to the conclusion that there are no definite views expressed, but a very strong inclination is given both by the Secretary of State and by the committee that we were badly cheated and that it went really to the very verge of fraud to give an award for five millions and a half upon a case that had not more than $35,000 a year interest in it. That seemed to be what they were trying to do. I would greatly prefer that they should say so if it is so, and not beat around the bush and imply it without saying so.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I cannot resist the apprehension that we are likely to take a false step in this business. What is the real complaint here? It is that too much money has been awarded to be paid by the United States. That is the real trouble about it. If the award had been what we think reasonable we would have heard no question about whether the arbitrators must be unanimous or whether a majority could make award. It is simply because the award is, in the opinion of our Government, grossly too large that this discussion has arisen.

Mr. MORRILL. And because, I will add, the award should have been on the other side; something should have been coming to us.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL. I say, and because the award was not payable to the United States; that something should have been coming to us instead of to the British government.

Mr. THURMAN. I never heard anybody claim yet that the award ought to have been in our favor. If it had been in our favor then I suppose we would have been satisfied. If it had been for a sum that was considered reasonable I think we would not have raised any technical objection that the award was made by two; that it was not unanimous. The real matter is, that this award is for more money than any Senator on this floor believes ought to have been awarded. I am sure that it seems to me upon the statement of this report—and that is all or very nearly all I know about it—that this award is for a great deal too large a sum. To that extent I agree with the Committee on Foreign Relations, but it does not necessarily follow that we should adopt this resolution, much less that we should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, let us see how it is. I think there are two sides to the question, if we begin to look into the amount of the award. The Geneva tribunal established certain principles, holding Great Britain liable for certain classes of damages. From those rules, thus determined by that tribunal, it was perfectly easy, with the evidence before them, to ascertain what amount ought to be paid by Great Britain. The tribunal intended to pay for nothing but the losses for which it held Great Britain accountable. It intended to pay nothing to the United States for what were called the indirect damages, the consequential damages. It intended to pay but once when there were double claims. In other words, by its rulings it defined the classes of losses that were to be paid for with almost absolute certainty, for that is certain which can be rendered certain, and then it proceeded to award to us the sum of fifteen and a half million dollars in gold.

Now it turns out, in the opinions of some persons, that the claims upon which the award was made, the losses taken into consideration by the Geneva tribunal, and for which it mulcted Great Britain in damages, and for which alone it mulcted her in damages, did not amount to fifteen and a half million dollars by several millions. It would be a nice question, perhaps, whether or no if we were to release the alleged excessive award made by the Geneva tribunal it would not be an offset to these five millions that are awarded on account of the fisheries. I know very well that no one has proposed to pay any money back to Great Britain on account of that supposed excess. I know that there have been bills again and again introduced into each House to absorb the whole of that award by paying it to persons for whose losses the Geneva tribunal solemnly decided that Great Britain was not responsible, and again and again it has been proposed to pay it upon claims that were withdrawn by the American Government before the Geneva tribunal. I know that, and I do not know but that that will be done. I do not know but that one large class of persons upon whose claims that tribunal held Great Britain responsible, and for the payment of whose claims that tribunal decided that Great Britain should pay us money—I do not know but that their claims will be thrown out of consideration altogether by the American Congress and the money that belongs to them, as justly as any money belongs to any human being by any title whatsoever, will be taken and given to other persons whose claims were rejected by the Geneva tribunal and have no place whatsoever in its findings.

It does seem to me under these circumstances that we ought not to be very particular in looking into amounts. I rather think that the true and dignified course is to do what Great Britain did with us. Without one word of remonstrance, without any representation, she punctually paid the fifteen millions and a half; and it does seem to me that it would be more consistent with the dignity of this Government for us to pay this award without anything whatever that would look like questioning the honor or the integrity of the tribunal by which the award was made. That strikes me as really being the most dignified course for a great nation like the United States.

I grant, sir, that when the time shall come when we are to consider whether this article of the treaty shall be extended for another term of years it will be very proper indeed for us to say, "This award affords no precedent whatever in estimating the damages; it was wrong, it was grossly erroneous; we will not stand by it at all, and if you insist upon any such sum as that we will not agree to an extension of the treaty at all for another term." That will all be very right and proper when the time shall come, but it is not the thing now to pay this money grudgingly and grumblingly with representations to the British government that look like begging it to give up a part, that look like begging it to say that Great Britain has a great advantage and ought to give up a part of it for the sake of peace or harmony or justice or what not. I must say, Mr. President, that for one I do not think it consistent with the dignity or character of this Government. I agree that this award is wrong upon the testimony laid before us by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it is very greatly erroneous in amount; but Great Britain no doubt thought that the Geneva award was very grossly wrong in amount too, yet she made no representations to us. However she may have disliked that award she made no representations to us to ask us to throw off a little. She did not ask us to inquire whether that tribunal was lawful or not. She paid the money; and in my judgment the dignity and the character of this country require that we should pay too, and pay without any of this protest that is proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, for the time being I will withdraw the amendment I offered and shall probably submit one in a better form to meet the objections that were made yesterday, before the debate on this matter is through, if anything else is to be said; if not I will submit to a vote now on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question recurs on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. McMILLAN. Whatever disposition may be made of the amendments which may be offered to the resolution, I wish to say that I regard the principle involved in the treaty of Washington as highly creditable to both the contracting parties. The principle of abitration embodied in that treaty inaugurated the settlement of difficulties between the nations of the world in a peaceable manner. The credit of that movement belongs to the Government of the United States. I have always adverted to that matter with great pride as an American citizen. Not only the measure itself was inaugurated, as it was, by our nation, a Republic whose mission is to extend peace throughout the world and bless all mankind, but it was initiated and inaugurated after coming through a great war in which we established a reputation in the world which commanded and ever will command the respect of all nations; and it was done while there was at the head of the administration of the Government at least one of the greatest generals of the earth. I take great pride in adverting to that measure, and reflecting that it was inaugurated by our Government. Whatever may be the result of this arbitration I trust that such a course will be pursued as will not interfere or impair this great principle of arbitration to settle the affairs of nations. It saved us from a great war.

Mr. BLAINE. A war with whom?

Mr. McMILLAN. With Great Britain, and I trust in the end it will result in the establishment of this principle between all nations.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I am very free to say that if by inadvertence, by virtue of the Geneva award, too much money was paid to the United States, I for one, on the ascertainment of that fact, would vote to return the money. I should not feel that this country had acquitted itself properly unless it should do so under such circumstances. But I am not prepared to concur in what was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] a moment ago. I do not think it yet appears that too much money was awarded to the United States. My understanding is that there is a large class of claimants which the legislation of Congress had heretofore has excluded; and whether if those claimants were allowed to share in the distribution of that fund there would be a surplus remaining is to be seen. In looking over the groundwork of the treaty and the award, it appears to me that it was expressly understood by those who arbitrated those matters of difference between the United States and Great Britain that the insurance companies were to share in the distribution of that fund; and up to this time they have not done so.

My simple purpose was in this connection to say that if it should turn out that there was money awarded to the United States by the Geneva tribunal to which they were not fairly entitled, whether it was by inadvertence or by mistake or by any other cause, we should not hesitate one moment to vote to return every dollar of such surplus.

But, sir, I wish to make a remark or two upon the resolution now before the Senate. I have looked into the subject somewhat, and if my information is correct I am not prepared to vote for the resolution reported by the committee. If I see the subject correctly, there are three objections to paying the sum awarded to Great Britain. First, there are substantial grounds of complaint as to the formation of the commission. It is very clear to my mind that Mr. Delfosse was not appointed one of the commissioners in the way that he ought to have been and in the way that was contemplated by this Government and by Great Britain. In the second place, the American commissioner, Mr. Kellogg, did not join in the award nor did he sanction it. In the third place, it seems to me undeniable that the sum awarded was grossly exorbitant and unreasonable in any conceivable point of view. This being true, it seems to me that we owe it to the dignity of this Government, we owe it to right, we owe it to our self-respect, to declare through the legislative department of the Government that this award is unacceptable to this Government. It seems to me that the proper step to be taken is to declare by resolution setting out the various grounds upon which exceptions are taken, that it is unacceptable to the Government, and then we ought to suggest to the President to correspond with Great Britain upon the subject, submitting to that government the grounds of exception taken by this Government, and after the matter shall be discussed it will be time enough then to pay such sum of money as it may be determined in the end ought to be paid. In this way alone can we litigate this matter. There is no court to which we can appeal to decide this difference; it must be settled by diplomacy; and it seems to me that the method proposed to reach that settlement is not the one that ought to be pursued.

We are not satisfied; that is manifest. All who have spoken on this subject have intimated in the broadest terms that they are not satisfied with this award, and the grounds of dissatisfaction are intimated. They are intimated all through the report of the committee; and the Senator from Vermont has already proposed an amendment—I believe he has withdrawn it temporarily—by which he throws out a threat to the government of Great Britain, "If you accept this award under the circumstances we intend to put an end to the treaty at the earliest possible moment." I do not concur in that way of doing. If we shall determine that this award ought to be paid, then, when under the terms of the treaty we give notice that it shall be ended, let us do it; but let us not pay stingily and grudgingly an award and at the same time slap Great Britain in the face. I think that would savor of insolence; it is an act we ought not to do. But, sir, back of all that, I maintain that the true course for this Government to pursue is to declare through its legislative authority that this award is not satisfactory to this Government. It is not satisfactory to the Government, in the first place, because of the manner in which the commission was constituted; in the second place, upon the ground that the American commissioner did not concur, when, according to law, he should have done so before there was any award in law; in the third place, that the sum awarded is grossly exorbitant and unreasonable in every conceivable point of view. Then let the President, with this expression of views by Congress, go on and diplomatize with Great Britain as to these various exceptions.

These are my views, and I wished simply to explain the grounds on which I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I shall support the report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, although I would wish that some amendments could be made to it. But I do not concur in what was implied in the remarks of the Senator from Ohio on this subject, that Great Britain had discharged her duties under this treaty with exemplary fidelity, and that we were in danger of not following a good example. I maintain that from the first, throughout the whole of this treaty—and I know I am taking what has not been heretofore a popular side, or the generally accepted version—it has been a treaty of a singularly one-sided character, in which, as I shall show, the entire advantage was gained by Great Britain, and in the parts that she has not esteemed it to be her interest to fulfill it, she has declined to fulfill it. Up to this day one of the most important parts of the treaty has been evaded and its fulfillment refused by Great Britain. Let me explain. When the joint high commission came to consider what were known as the Alabama claims they agreed upon three rules which Great Britain diplomatically disavowed through her commissioners to have been accepted rules of international law at the time, but said that they would agree to them as the basis of a settlement, and they might go before the tribunal as if they had been in force as principles of international law at the time of their alleged infraction. Then Great Britain and the United States in binding themselves to the observance of these rules in future assumed another mutual obligation in this clause of the treaty:

> And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of the other maritime powers and to invite them to accede to them.

Unless I am entirely misinformed, and I think I am correctly informed, Great Britain has refused up to this time, and it has been seven years this month since the treaty was perfected, to join with the United States in asking the other maritime powers to agree to those rules. I have ground for believing this statement to be substantially if not literally true, and if the Senate will support me in a resolution which I shall offer we shall find out, authentically, that Mr. Fish, lately Secretary of State, advised Great Britain that refusing to join with the United States in proposing these rules for other maritime powers the United States would be justified in treating them as a nullity. I do not pretend at all to be inside of the secrets and aims and purposes of British diplomacy, but I do know that having got those three rules which bind us very tightly, which make us keep a very sharp police on fifteen thousand miles of ocean front, that encircle our own dominions and hold us accountable for any privateers or depredators or "Alabamas" or any sort of cruisers that may get out in case Great Britain goes to war with Russia, as is now possible if not probable, (I hope not even probable,) and makes us accountable in damages afterward for any losses thus resulting to her subjects—that while she holds us thus closely under the three rules she has not asked another nation in all Europe to be bound by those rules; she has refused to join the United States in asking the maritime powers to accept them and be bound by them. I do not believe in having one part of the treaty quoted on us to the letter, "which killeth," and then to have the part which does not exactly comport with the interest of Great Britain absolutely slurred over and denied.

I repeat, I do not pretend to see any further through secret and hidden motives than anybody else, and I do not pretend to know, much less do I pretend to state, what the motive of Great Britain is, although I have heard it, and I have heard that it was because the government of the German Empire objected to those rules being made general in Europe. At all events it is known, and we ought to know here authentically—and it would be some advantage to know it before we pass on this measure—we ought to know authentically what has transpired between this Government and the government of Great Britain with regard to these three rules, which were so finely chiseled and so closely drawn and so narrowly constructed that when we got into the tribunal at Geneva we were practically powerless. When confessedly the aid and support of Great Britain to the rebellion had been hundreds of millions of dollars of damage to this country; when they swept our mercantile marine, two-thirds of it, out of existence; when their aid and countenance to the confederacy had destroyed one of the great leading interests of the United States, we consented to such a narrow construction of these three rules as absolutely cut us down to fifteen and a half million dollars for damages, and Great Britain at once gets seven and a half million of that back—two million on the Washington claims commission of 1871-'72, and now five and a half million more on this fishery award.

So when the Senator from Ohio holds up the example of Great Britain to us to imitate in this matter, I beg him to observe what Great Britain's course has been in regard to this part of the treaty. It was Great Britain's highest interest to pay the Geneva award. She never paid $15,000,000 in her life that was so good an investment as that was under the circumstances. Whether we can find anybody, under the narrow rules that were laid down, that is a lawful claimant for the money awarded us at Geneva, is quite another thing; that is for us to determine, but Great Britain herself gained the incalculable advantage of making us a practical ally to her, willing or unwilling, in all her contests with European powers. The Russians are watched by every form of observation if they land on the coast of Maine, or if they buy a vessel in New York or Philadelphia; and the moment there is a declaration of war, instead of Great Britain doing the watching, we shall be compelled under the three rules to do it ourselves. We shall be forced on the anxious seat, and if a Russian vessel should escape from our coast and Great Britain could show that we have not used due diligence, we are to be responsible in the amounts of money that may result from her depredations on British commerce. Great Britain gets all these vast advantages out of us and then refuses, as I say, for some reason and continues to refuse up to this time to agree that other maritime nations in whose adoption of these three rules we might have very great interests shall act on them—refuses even to submit them as the treaty bound her to do, and she has permitted seven years to go by without so much as uniting with us in asking a single European power to accept them.

Now, let us go back a little, inasmuch as we are discussing this subject generally, as the Senator from Ohio has introduced it. When the war broke out in 1861, Mr. Seward, through our minister at the court of St. James, Mr. Adams, immediately proposed that the United States should become a party to the treaty of Paris, to which there had been forty-six or forty-seven nations of the earth already parties, to suppress privateering. Lord John Russell, recently deceased, apparently received the proposition with the utmost complaisance and agreed to it; and after the agreement was made and we thought the treaty was about to become a regular convention between the two governments, he put in a condition that it should not at all affect the existing relations between Great Britain and the Confederate States, or that the question should not in the least degree be affected by the relations of any internal dissensions in the United States; in other words that if we lived to survive the rebellion in the United States, the very time when we should not need the advantage of this treaty, we might then enjoy it; but that pending that we should not have any advantage from it at all. And the British government would not agree on the other hand that if any disturbance should take place in any part of the British empire we should not be similarly bound as England was then. Let me read just what Mr. Seward said on that point:

> The proposed declaration is inadmissible, among other reasons, because it is not mutual. It proposes a special rule by which Her Majesty's obligations shall be meliorated in their bearing upon internal difficulties now prevailing in the United States, while the obligations to be assumed by the United States shall not be similarly meliorated or at all affected in their bearing on internal differences that may now be prevailing or may hereafter arise and prevail in Great Britain.

The whole of it was one-sided. And now I will give the honorable Senator from Ohio a very substantial reason why the Government of the United States ought to proceed on the payment of the fishery award in a different manner from that which the Government of Great Britain adopted with reference to the Geneva award. The struggles between the Dominion of Canada, or that which now constitutes the Dominion of Canada, the British-American provinces, and the United States for reciprocal relations of trade and commerce have been troublesome questions for eighty years, and every time we have attempted to adjust them the fisheries have been put forward as the stumbling-block in the way of a fair agreement. And the payment of the five and a half millions settles the question for only twelve years, and then it is all open again. But, on the other hand, the fifteen and a half millions paid in pursuance of the Geneva award closed that account for all time; or, if it left it open at all, it left it open with the three rules operating in Great Britain's favor. But let us pay this five and a half millions as the honorable Senator from Ohio invites us to do; let us walk up without saying one word and pay this five and a half million dollars to Great Britain, and what is the result? It is inevitably accepted by the Government of Great Britnin as a concession on the part of the Government of the United States, as a just measure of value of those fishery privileges, and any subsequent notice that we might give six or eight years hence would be treated as an afterthought. If we do not make that point at this time, we lose all the advantage of making it at all; and if we now pay that money without in some form emphatically entering our dissent from it as a just measure of the value of the fisheries, we are estopped from ever pleading it hereafter, and we shall have committed ourselves to the conclusion that those fisheries in reciprocal arrangements for trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States are to be reckoned as of the value of a half million dollars per annum bonus from the United States in addition to the admission of Canadian fish free of duty to our markets.

This question, Mr. President, has some sectional and local relation, I know. We are much more affected by it where I come from than are the people where the Senator from Ohio comes from. It is a matter of daily, very pressing interest with us, and we know very well that if we sit still here and consent to this award being accepted publicly as a just measure of value we never can have the trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States regulated hereafter upon any fair, equitable, amicable basis.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has covered a great deal of ground, and more, with great respect for his judgment, than it seems to me is involved in this inquiry. I do not propose, nor do I think it at all necessary, to discuss the wisdom of the treaty of Washington, which constituted the Geneva tribunal and those other tribunals to which reference has been made. What I thought about that treaty I expressed where it was proper, and in the only place where it was proper for me to express it while the thing was in fieri. What I thought of it the executive Journal of the Senate will show by my votes. Now I do not see that much is to be gained by questioning or discussing the wisdom or unwisdom, to use a newly coined word, of that. But if I were disposed to do that, I could question my friend from Maine with greater certainty as to what his views are.

If I understand him, he said Great Britain never made a better investment than the payment of the fifteen and a half millions of dollars awarded at Geneva, and the goodness of the investment consisted in getting the famous three rules; that the three rules were of such importance to Great Britain that she could well afford to pay fifteen and a half million dollars for the three rules, and that is a good investment for her. And yet these rules which the Senator thinks are of such great value to Great Britain, he complains that Great Britain does not recommend other powers to adopt.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator does not intend to misrepresent me——

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. BLAINE. I said that to have those three rules bind us down alone and leave all other nations free, was worth more than that to Great Britain, and Great Britain having secured our consent to those rules now refuses to carry out her plain obligation under the treaty, to recommend them to other nations, and the result is that here we stand, our hands crossed and tied by three rules which do not apply to any other maritime nation. That is what I said; and for that I say Great Britain could well afford to pay $30,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am still so dull that I cannot comprehend the logic of the Senator from Maine. If it is for the interest of Great Britain that these three rules should be binding on the United States, it is equally to her interest that they should bind other maritime powers; and therefore I cannot see why complaint is made that Great Britain has obtained a great bargain by the adoption of these three rules by the United States, and in the same breath it is said that Great Britain will not recommend any other maritime power to adopt them.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the Senator to maintain that every other maritime power would have precisely the same ability in a contest upon the seas to injure Great Britain that we have.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I did not say any such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. There consists the difference to Great Britain having us bound down and not others.

Mr. THURMAN. But there are other maritime powers that are closer to Great Britain than we are.

Mr. BLAINE. And therefore more easily watched and guarded.

Mr. THURMAN. And that could annoy her perhaps quite as much as we could.

But, Mr. President, I think the Senator has totally mistaken the motive which led to the adoption of the three rules. I never had any doubt why the three rules were adopted. I said in the Senate why I thought they were adopted, and I adhere to that opinion. They were adopted, not because Great Britain wanted them as permanent rules, but they were adopted to enable the Geneva tribunal to make an award against Great Britain in order that there might be peace between Great Britain and us. It was necessary to devise some plan by which damages could be awarded against Great Britain without impugning the honor of her government, and these three rules were adopted as a convenient mode, an artificial mode, of furnishing means to the Geneva tribunal to make an award against Great Britain. That is my belief, and I shall die in it. But that is neither here nor there, it seems to me, in this business.

There was one thing said by the Senator that strikes me as having weight with it, but not the weight that he attaches to it. He thinks if we do not protest against the magnitude of this award we shall be estopped hereafter to say that is not a fair measure of damages. I do not so understand it at all. I suppose that every man against whom a judgment is rendered in a court may think the judgment is too high; but yet he pays it. Judgment is rendered against us. There will a time come when we must consider whether or not we will extend this treaty for another term, and then it will be very proper for us to say, (and in fact it is proper enough to say it now in the debates of the Senate,) "We will not adopt any such measure of damages as that awarded against us before." That will be the time. But what I say is that it is not wisdom in paying the money awarded to Great Britain to pay it in this ungracious way.

Now, Mr. President, if the conclusions of the Committee on Foreign Relations are correct, I do not think there is any reason for ever extending that treaty at all. Why, what is it that the committee report? That this privilege is only worth $25,000 a year to our fishermen, and that on the other hand we lose between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year in duties on fish imported into this country. If that is the case, what is the use of talking about the measure of damages? Are we ever going to extend this treaty if that is the case? If the whole benefit to our fishermen is only $25,000 a year and we lose between three and four hundred thousand dollars annually in duties every year, will there be a Senator on this floor four years hence who will think for one moment of extending the terms of the treaty? Not one. We shall have no trouble about a measure of damages, for nobody will think about any damages or think about any treaty. The treaty will certainly expire or will be abrogated. So I do not think there is any trouble about this measure of damages or any precedent that is going to vex us at all if the facts are as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

One word more and I shall have done. I do not wish to be understood as saying that at Geneva we recovered more than we ought to have recovered. I do not mean to say that the Geneva tribunal in all its rulings, excluding the claims that it did exclude, was in every case correct. I do not mean that at all. What I have said was simply this, that taking the cases for which that tribunal held Great Britain to be responsible, and calculating the losses as they turned out to be upon judicial investigation, there are people who say—I do not exactly know how it is myself, and I do not pretend, therefore, to affirm it—that the award is four or five millions more than the losses covered by the rules laid down by the Geneva tribunal. Whether this is so or not, I do not pretend to say; but there are people who say so. It has been so stated in Great Britain; it has been the subject of comment in the newspapers of Great Britain, and I do not know but that it was once the subject of remark in the House of Commons. I am not sure about that, but that is my impression.

Mr. CONKLING. In both houses.

Mr. THURMAN. It may have been the subject of remark there in both houses. And so I did say that when it came to a question of mere dollars, whether the tribunals have erred in their computation of damages, it did not very well become us or the dignity of this country to pay this money in a grudging and ungraceful manner. Great Britain paid us fifteen millions and a half which she thought then and still thinks no doubt was too much; she paid it in a graceful manner and without any such representations as are here proposed, and I am not willing that she shall set a higher example of dignity and propriety than the Great Republic.

I wish further to say in respect to the fact to which the Senator alludes that Great Britain has refused to join with the United States in recommending these rules, that if I ever heard it before I have forgotten it. The Senator no doubt has authority for what he said.

Mr. BLAINE. I stated it, I think, on good authority.

Mr. THURMAN. I know nothing of it.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say in reply to the Senator from Ohio that if it be true that we received more under the Geneva award than we can find proper owners for under the narrow limits and construction forced upon us, it seems to me the dictate of honor and of propriety and of dignity, and of all the principles that should govern nations, would require us to return it; but I should not from that infer that because we somehow had come to the conclusion that in a certain reference we got more than we were entitled to, therefore we should submit to a gross imposition without saying anything about it in another reference. I do not think that exactly comports with the dignity of either nation. If we have more money under the Geneva award than we can find proper owners for, I will vote to return it; but I will never vote to pay five and a half million dollars under the fishery award which I know to be excessive, without at least going as far as the Committee on Foreign Relations recommend us to go in intimating to Great Britain the grounds on which we predicate our disbelief as to its rightfulness and justice.

The Senator from Ohio either does not understand these three rules, or I do not. Either I have entirely misconceived their probable scope, or the honorable Senator has. He says they were merely artificial rules—I think that was the word he used—for the purpose of enabling the Geneva conference to go ahead and make an award. They are very brief. Let me read them:

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or to carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Having agreed on these rules, the solemn agreement at the end was:

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and to invite them to accede to them.

The Senator from Ohio knows that in any contest which England is likely to get into with European powers—and those are the powers she is likely to get in conflict with—we are the neutral power; in other words, we are more likely to be neutral in regard to Great Britain's contests than a European nation is likely to be, and that as regards contests in Europe between continental nations England herself is most frequently the neutral power. Then, as respects the rights and privileges of England, we are to-day practically in alliance with her. If a war should break out to-morrow between Russia and England, there is no calculating the advantage to England of these three rules binding us. And there we stand. But England is evidently unwilling to bind herself by these rules in her relations with other powers, and unwilling also to give us the advantage of having other powers so bound; and if at any time war should break out between Austria and Russia or between Germany and France or between any other European nations England is not bound by these rules. So as it stands to-day we are under bonds to keep the peace and England has refused to ask other nations to unite in doing that which she came under a solemn treaty-stipulation to do. I am glad to be able to say, as I think it will be shown by the official correspondence, that the government of Great Britain has already received an intimation that we shall be justified in treating these rules as a nullity, she having refused to perform her part of the treaty obligation in asking other powers to accede to them.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] that the treaty of Washington is a transaction in the highest degree creditable to all who were engaged in it. I do not by this mean to refer to all its details or to the special agencies which were employed in its negotiation. I mean that the general and underlying idea of that transaction was in the highest degree creditable to the President and to those members of this body who were then in his counsels in the administration of the Government.

This country believed it had suffered an incalculable injury, that by the conduct of Great Britain a great vital war in which it was engaged had been prolonged; that large expenditures of life and of treasure had been caused which without the departure from the recognized rules of international law by England, in our time of trial and peril, we never should have been called upon to incur; and we met that question, a strong, powerful, united, victorious nation flushed with recent victory and with a great and victorious general at its head conducting its executive affairs and having charge of its diplomacy as well as a voice in its legislation. But we had let the time of the offense pass for reasons satisfactory to us, reasons growing out of the danger to us of taking up the quarrel at the time. We had omitted to resent or to attempt to punish by force the departures by Great Britain from the laws of neutrality which under the laws of nations she ought to have governed herself by at the time her offenses against us were committed.

Now we had when this question was brought to the attention of Congress during the administration of President Grant two alternatives besides that of arbitration, both injurious to us, both injurious to the best interests of mankind. One was the alternative of declaring an immediate war against Great Britain. Whichever of the two countries would have suffered most in that war it is clear that the chief sufferers by such a contest and quarrel would have been that portion of the English people who had stood by us in sympathy and conduct during the whole of our trial at the expense of great suffering to themselves. Here were the two great English-speaking nations, two great nations whose policy by different and yet similar methods is determined by the public opinion of their people, and the only important nations on earth of whom that was true. A war between England and the United States at that time would have for a generation stricken down the influence and the power in the councils of Great Britain of the class of people who entertained the same opinions, who loved the same liberty, who looked forward to the same results and objects in government as ourselves.

The other alternative, and the only one which was suggested by the opponents of this treaty, would, in my judgment, have been still more degrading to us and injurious to mankind; that was that we should await an opportunity when England was at war or was in difficulty in the future, and at some unknown, perhaps remote, time, in violation of what we had declared was the obligation of public honor and of public law, should retaliate upon her.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator did not understand me as intimating that?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir, I had nothing that the Senator from Maine had said in my mind when I made that observation at all.

We should have presented, in other words, what it seems to me would have been the most pitiable, degrading, infamous spectacle which could have been presented upon the face of the earth, the spectacle of a great, powerful, intelligent, free people lying in wait to revenge itself; lying in wait to revenge itself for a wrong which at the time of its occurrence it had not the power, although undoubtedly it had the spirit, to undertake to punish.

The administration of President Grant met this great question and this great exigency in a great way. Just as from the dangers of the rebellion the party then administering the Government took the great opportunity to broaden and extend and make perpetual human liberty, so from the exigency and danger and wrong of this incalculable injury that England had inflicted upon us the men who were charged with the administration of our Government took the opportunity to plant in the international customs of mankind this great principle in favor of peace and civilization, the principle of submitting wrongs inflicted by one nation upon another, not to the arbitrament of force, the result of which always is that the conduct of nations to each other has been determined by their relative strength, but to the arbitrament of law. Compared with that accomplishment the question of a few million dollars of mistake in damages, more or less, is a trifle.

I do not concur with the Senator from Maine when he thinks that England got out of us certain obligations by that treaty by which we are bound and by which our hands are tied, while the hands of other nations are left free in the future. The obligation of those three rules upon the United States depends not upon the treaty of 1871, with Great Britain, in the least. They are the rules which we had declared were binding upon us as rules of international law from the foundation of our Government; they were rules which we claimed in the negotiation had governed the conduct of the United States from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. What is the authority to which he refers for saying that we had always insisted upon those rules as a part of the public law governing neutral rights?

Mr. HOAR. The obligation to use due diligence?

Mr. HOWE. What is the authority to which the Senator refers when he says we had always insisted upon those rules?

Mr. HOAR. I refer to the known history of our Government, to the arguments of our counsel at Geneva, to our diplomatic arguments in the negotiations which preceded the treaty, to the representations made to Great Britain by our diplomatic agents abroad during the war and at the time the original causes of offense arose. And I understand that the purpose of incorporating these rules in this form in the treaty was not because the United States Government in the least admitted or conceded that any one of them required any new sanction as an operative rule to govern the conduct of neutral nations toward belligerents, but it was to impose upon Great Britain the obligation of paying damages in conformity to the claim of the United States without a formal admission on her part, which might be regarded as dishonoring to her, that she had violated what she admitted was then the public law governing nations.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, if I understand the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the United States held them to be rules of international law, but no other nation did?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine very strangely misunderstands me if he understands me so.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator to say that the United States was insisting on these three rules as what she had always insisted on. Did I understand the Senator correctly in that?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. Then did the United States insist on this alone, or did other nations also?

Mr. HOAR. The United States undoubtedly claimed that those rules found their sanction in the practice and in the concurrence of other civilized nations.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. Then the Senator says that the United States claimed that they were rules of international law, but the representatives of Great Britain said:

Her Britannic Majesty has commanded her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that Her Majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator from Massachusetts does not contend that the United States itself could hold what was international law?

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. I understand that the United States claimed that these rules were the rules of international law and had been binding on all nations and an obligation resting upon all mankind.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. But now the Senator will observe that not only did Great Britain dissent from that, but Great Britain has refused to unite, according to her treaty obligation, with the United States in asking other nations, and down to this very day and hour there is not a nation under the canopy of heaven that is bound to Great Britain by those rules except the United States of America.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, there is not a nation under the canopy of heaven, according to the uniform contention of the United States, that is not bound by these rules to-day, Great Britain included.

Mr. BLAINE, "According to the contention of the United States;"

but the Senator from Massachusetts does not mean that what the United States holds to be the duty of nations constitutes international law? It is the agreement between nations. The United States has no right to get up and say, "sic volo sic jubeo." Why does the United States declare that to be international law?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine, it seems to me, either fails to perceive the broad, simple distinction or I fail to understand him; one or the other. The United States based their claim upon Great Britain for damages upon the fact that Great Britain had violated a duty of neutrals, not created by any simple declaration of a single nation, not created by any treaty obligation, but found, declared, enforced, and approved by the concurrent practice of civilized nations and the authority of the great jurists and writers on international law from whom, as sources, the international law is derived. Great Britain denied that and the United States made her claim for damages. Great Britain not only denied it but departed from its obligation in practice by which we suffered. They met to compound that quarrel, and Great Britain and the United States agreed, first, that Great Britain would apologize, would insert in the treaty an apology; in the next place, that a tribunal should be appointed who should assess damages against Great Britain for her past conduct upon those rules, Great Britain saying: "We do not admit the correctness of the rule of law which the United States rests its claim upon;" the United States, however, never abandoning that claim—not as a claim resting on the declaration of the United States, but as a claim growing out of the admitted law of nations. When Great Britain agreed to bring these rules to the notice of the world, which obligation the Senator from Maine says she has failed to perform, it was not that the United States intended to admit for a moment that without that commendation of these two nations to other maritime powers or without any new and express admission on the part of them or any one of them, they were not binding rules of public law at all; is was merely to obtain for a rule of public law resting for its sanction on what we may call the common law of nations as distinct from a statute, but which the United States claimed was admitted by all nations and had been transgressed by Great Britain, to add to that the additional sanction of an express, explicit, affirmative statement and declaration of the rule. Suppose the day after the treaty of Washington had been agreed upon between the United States and Great Britain we had engaged in another war, and Spain or Chili or Brazil or Germany or France had violated these rules before Great Britain had had an opportunity to bring them to their notice, the United States would have claimed that they were violating neutral duties, would have demanded redress, and would have insisted at the proper time on compensation.

Mr. BLAINE. If I do not interrupt the Senator, then I understand him to say that if we had got the Geneva tribunal together even without these rules they would have been compelled to recognize them.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. What was the point, then, of insisting so strongly on having it?

Mr. HOAR. I think if I had a lawsuit with the honorable Senator from Maine in which I claimed that the law was one way and he the other——

Mr. BLAINE. But I think the Senator said——

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from Maine sometimes forgets that somebody else is speaking, as well, as himself.

If I had a lawsuit with the honorable Senator from Maine, and I claimed that in the performance of a certain act to my injury he had violated a rule of law, of which rule he denied the existence, does he doubt that it would be a great advantage to me in leaving that to arbitrators that I should get his agreement that the arbitrators should find that the rule of law was and always had been for the purposes of that decision my way?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course. I have argued that all along.

Now, if I do not trench on the Senator's time, will he also tell me—he started me on a very emphatic first—what they agreed to, and, second, what they agreed to? and he left out the third. They agreed afterward to submit these rules to the nations of the world.

Mr. HOAR. That I did not leave out.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not hear that from the Senator. They agreed that they should be submitted.

Mr. HOAR. Let me state what I said. The Senator from Maine did not understand me before. I do not understand or concede or believe that that clause was put into the treaty of Washington as an admission, or concession, or in consequence of a belief on the part of the Administration of the United States that those rules of international law would not be just as binding upon all mankind without that recommendation, or if under it the nations should refuse to accede to it as it was before. But they desired to have for what rested in argument from the practice of mankind, for what rested on the authority of text-writers or jurists, or writers on international law, the benefit of an express, clear stipulation and declaration of the rule, and a declaration of that rule in terms which the United States itself had dictated.

Mr. BLAINE. If I understand the Senator, it comes to this: the United States thinks these rules are principles of international law and Great Britain says they are not principles of international law; but admits for a particular arbitration that they might be so regarded.

Mr. HOAR. And they each would so govern themselves for the future.

Mr. BLAINE. And for the rest of the nations Great Britain refuses now to join with the United States in asking that they shall be rules of international law; and yet the Senator says they are universally recognized as principles of international law.

Mr. HOAR. That is not a point which I rose to discuss with the Senator from Maine. I know nothing about it. I am not aware of the history of the request on the part of our Government to Great Britain to comply with this stipulation of the treaty, and I am very glad——

Mr. BLAINE. You are aware the treaty required it?

Mr. HOAR. Of course I am.

Mr. BLAINE. And you have never seen any publication that it has been complied with.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly not. I am very glad to hear from the Senator from Maine that he understands steps are being taken to insist upon that obligation. That is a consideration totally foreign to those which I rose to address to the Senate and which I should have completed long ago if I had not been interrupted. My remarks have nothing to do with that point whether England has or has not complied with it. I said in passing, which gave rise to this colloquy with the Senator from Maine, while I was dealing with another branch of the subject altogether, that I did not agree that Great Britain had obtained by the treaty of Washington an advantage as binding us to a stricter rule of the duties of neutrality than those which we conceived ourselves bound by before.

Mr. HOWE rose.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me—I wish to complete this statement—for a moment. Of course I cannot speak from any knowledge; but I do not think that those members of this body who concurred in that treaty will any of them be found to admit that they meant to extend upon this nation, to be a great neutral nation usually in the future, especially as to Great Britain, obligations of neutral duty or of neutral care other than they conceived rested upon her by the admitted law of nations before. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. HOWE. Now, if the Senator will indulge me in a single remark, which I make more to explain the interest with which I am listening to his statement than for any other purpose, I want to say right here that I do understand, unlike the Senator from Massachusetts, that those three rules put restrictions upon neutral rights against which this country had protested from its beginning till the Alabama controversy sprang up, and in support of it stands the whole history of Great Britain. She had always, up to the time of that controversy, insisted upon that narrow construction of neutral rights, and we had always protested against it; and I do understand, unlike the Senator from Massachusetts, that we based our claim against Great Britain not so much upon our own interpretation or her interpretation of neutral rights, as defined in public law, as upon those rights as defined in Great Britain's municipal law and in our own municipal law.

Mr. HOAR. Then, Mr. President, I understand the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, a distinguished member of the party which was largely responsible for the treaty of Washington, to say that we pressed upon Great Britain a claim for—what? Alleged misconduct of hers, admitting all the time that we should have had the right to have done the same thing in her place, that it was violating no principle of the law of nations as we understood it, and that our claim rested on the narrow and technical ground that Great Britain had previously governed her conduct when she was not obliged to do so by the law of nations by a different rule, and that she ought not to have changed her mind and brought her conduct into conformity with the laws of nations at the particular time when she did it. Having, of course, no personal authority and no great personal knowledge of what governed the President who negotiated or the Senate who agreed to the treaty of Washington at the time, I beg leave as an American citizen valuing the honor of my own country to disclaim, for one, any such notion of the treaty of Washington.

Mr. HOWE. I want to set the Senator right.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to say just one word? I will not occupy three minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I will not occupy but two minutes in finishing my speech.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was done.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

Now, Mr. President, it was the purpose of these two nations, having regard to the great causes of difference, having regard to the probable rivalries and dangers of hostility in the future on the one hand, having regard on the other to the fact that they were the two greatest nations in the world, greatest in their power by sea or by land, the two nations most advanced in civilization, speaking the same language, largely of the same origin, having largely the same institutions, and chiefly the only two important nations on earth who recognized that government was to be determined, by whatever forms or by whatever agencies, in substance by the opinion of the majority of the people governed—they undertook to take the occasion of this great wrong and this great quarrel to remove every possible cause of quarrel for the future, and to do it by resorting to the humane and peaceable principle of arbitration. And in that spirit this arrangement in regard to the fishery question, which has resulted so far from what I suppose was the expectation of either party when it was entered into, was incorporated into the treaty.

Now, I differ with the honorable Senator from Ohio. It seems to me that the important thing in dealing with this question is so to deal with it that this principle of international arbitration may be preserved and honored, and not dismissed with contempt as a rule practice in the future. Here is a case unlike the ordinary case of arbitration between individuals where the courts are open and where a higher authority can deal with them. Here is a case where, as we conceive, there has been a clear, plain, and enormous error in the judgment and award of the commissioners. But we remember that the other party has no other reliance for enforcing it but a reliance upon our honor. I do not attribute, as some Senators do, very much importance or the chiefest importance in this connection to the question whether the award was the award of a majority or was unanimous. I know that the treaty in other parts, where it provided for the Geneva award and for the British claims commission, provided that the award of a majority should govern and that there is no such provision in the article in question; but Great Britain can, if she chooses, argue with great force that it is incredible that, taking the whole spirit and purpose of that treaty, considering it as a mechanism which was to remove all causes of difference between the two nations on account of the fishery question for the future, it should have been supposed by either party that nothing should be accomplished to which the United States on the one hand or England on the other did not give their concurrence.

But I do not undertake to deal with that question. The other point is the important one. Here is an award of five million and a half of dollars or thereabouts——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very sum.

Mr. HOAR. The very sum, for the privilege of catching, at great expense and at great peril and with great hardship and with a great investment for means and appliances, fish for a term of years, when the whole value of the catch, of the fish caught, brought to market, and sold is very largely less than the sum which has been charged. That is a case of a clear, palpable mistake, and it seems to me that there is no want of dignity, that there is nothing which in the least involves the dignity of this Government, in pointing out that consideration to the government of Great Britain, and asking of her administration, with the aid of her own law officers, or in such other way as she shall see fit, to say whether she does not agree with us in thinking that there is a plain mistake. I would not accompany it by any menace. I would not accompany it by any suggestion that we do not propose to pay the whole sum if England shall be of opinion that it ought to be exacted. Still less would I accompany it, as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, with a suggestion that for any reason, present or future, it is likely to be for the interest of Great Britain in other respects not to exact this sum. I would submit this question to her by itself alone, not accompanied by any other considerations except those which address themselves to the sense of honor, the sense of justice of Great Britain, and to her own judgment of what the facts of the case require of her.

I beg to say that when I arose I supposed I should finish what I had to say in five minutes, but the time was extended by interruptions.

Mr. HOWE. I do not complain at all, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts has occupied too much time. He has misled me, however, as to the exact period at which he closed; and so I may have seemed a little impatient to take the floor. I do not mean myself, however, to keep it for more than a moment, and that mainly to state, if I can, rather more accurately than I think the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, what my claim is touching this Alabama controversy.

I did say, and I now repeat, that I understand those three rules to contain, not that declaration of neutral rights which we had always insisted upon as the true definition of public law up to the time of this controversy; and, because I say that, the Senator from Massachusetts understands me as charging that the late Administration, which had no more loyal friend in the United States than I was and am, pressed upon Great Britain a claim for damages for having done during a great war precisely what we would have done if we had been as she was, a neutral. No, Mr. President, I do not mean to charge that Administration with doing any such thing. Our claim, as I understand it, was pressed upon Great Britain upon three grounds, that she was a neutral while we were a belligerent, and our first complaint was that she made our adversary in that contest a belligerent when she had no right to do so.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator completes that statement, I wish to put him a question, because I know he will very clearly state the answer to that question as a part of what he is now about to state. Did we press upon Great Britain at Geneva during the last administration any claim except for a violation of those three rules?

Mr. HOWE. Did we press any? I cannot undertake, standing where I do, to answer that question directly, because I am not so familiar with the whole ground assumed in argument at Geneva. I am speaking about the case as we made it up against Great Britain and as it entered into our negotiations. We complained of Great Britain because she made, as I say, of our adversary a belligerent when she ought not to have done so; and, secondly, we complained that her conduct, if not in derogation of the rights of a neutral as defined by public law, was in derogation of those rights as defined by the public law upon which she had always insisted, of that law which she had enforced upon neutrals wherever she had had the opportunity and the power to do it; and, thirdly, because it was flatly in the face of every obligation as a neutral as defined in her own municipal statutes, statutes enacted for special purposes and induced by special considerations. These, as I said, were the three grounds upon which we pressed our claims against Great Britain.

Mr. HOAR. Now, will the Senator allow me right there? I understand, with great deference to his superior knowledge of what took place, that the last administration—I am not speaking about what particular Senators or particular administrations may have done—but that the last administration did not press its claim against Great Britain for the things which the Senator has stated; but, on the contrary, that Mr. Motley was reproved and, it is said by very high authority, removed, for going into the consideration, beyond his instructions, to which the Senator from Wisconsin has adverted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In spite of his instructions.

Mr. HOAR. In spite of his instructions, then; and that, so far from its being our claim that Great Britain did not act up to her own municipal statutes in our case, which she had made for other special cases alone, the great burden of our claim was that she was bound to make those statutes an instrumentality sufficient, and that she had not done it, to secure the observation of the principles of public law governing the nations of the world in like cases.

Mr. HOWE. I assume that either the Senator from Massachusetts or myself could make our respective positions more intelligent to the Senate or to the country if we were to repeat them several times. He may be right in his definition of that controversy, and I may be wrong; but I should think it was very strange if it should turn out that the United States of America, which has in fact been in all its previous history more usually a neutral than Great Britain has been, had been the power, the one power, which had insisted upon a strict definition of neutral rights, while Great Britain had been insisting upon a broad definition of those rights. My understanding is right the reverse of that, that a hundred years ago Great Britain was one of the powers on the face of the globe which would scarcely admit any such thing as a neutral right unless it was maintained by force of arms. All the public law recognizes to-day of neutral rights is mainly the work of the Government of the United States. I do not care to pursue that subject.

One single word now about the resolution. I am quite indifferent as to what shall become of that. I care but very little whether we make a protest about this award or not. I suppose there can be no dispute between two candid men, certainly no two candid Americans, that the amount of the award is exorbitant and extravagant beyond precedent; but I would not myself make a face for a moment about paying it on the single ground that it is large. If it is an award; if it is the judgment of the tribunal to whose judgment we appealed, then whether that award comports with our notions of justice or not I would submit to it and I would not make any particular fuss about it. But if it be not the judgment of that tribunal, if it be not in the law recognized in this country and in Great Britain an award of the arbitration to which the subject was submitted, then I think I would stand by the law on the subject and not stand by this and whine about a judgment. When, therefore, you come to consider the question of paying the money, I shall have something to say. So long as the question is merely whether we shall whine or not, I do not care to say anything about it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, had not the Senate voted to-day repeatedly to adjourn on the 17th of this month, I should fear that we might do, and possibly say, too much rather than too little about the topic before us. But as that period of duration has been fixed, perhaps there is no reason to apprehend that harm will come from any of the possible digressions into which this debate has been or may be led.

One of the best products of recent civilization was that great deed of composition which has come to be known as the treaty of Washington. A group of large and dangerous questions were lifted from the forum of force into the realm of reason and dignity, to be disposed of there. It would be lamentable, I think, if anything should be done now or at another time to impair the position of the United States touching so great a matter.

One of the differences between the parties to the treaty to which I refer was a matter of account about fisheries. Under the stipulation the two parties agreed to submit that to arbitration. It has been submitted, and an act has been done called an award. Now, Mr. President, if that is an award, I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not worth while to make wry faces or to do anything quite beside from the matter in respect of it. If it is not an award, if it is void for want of concurrence, if therefore it is jurisdictionally void as I think I might say, and utterly null, I would so declare. If a court proceeding against me should assume to render a judgment in respect of a matter of which it had no jurisdiction whatever, or if it should proceed to do something called rendering a judgment by an act or process entirely inconsequent and ineffectual, I should feel that I might and ought to say "that is no judgment." And the greater the instance in which the illustration may be put, the more manifest perhaps becomes the right of the matter.

On the other hand, although this be an award in form, if it is exorbitant, and not only exorbitant, but so grossly and glaringly so as to imply fraud or other matter on which the Congress of the United States shall hold that it may stand in denying the validity, although formally it is right, I would say so.

But, Mr. President, if neither of these cases exists, it seems to me I would not say any one of the several things which have been suggested. If the award has been made, and we are to pay it, let it be paid and paid as a great nation should discharge an obligation; and my impression is that, in that event, that is all that should be done with that matter.

Some other things may remain. The honorable Senator from Vermont has suggested one other. I would deal with those as I would deal with this, by themselves. I would not make a tender to Great Britain and say, "Here is the money, but if you take it we give you notice that therefore and thereupon we will not abide by this treaty after the time shall have come that we are not bound to abide by it." I would not do that, because I think it would impair and belittle the latter part of the act which, put by itself on its own foundation, would be more respectful. Particularly I would not do it when the only function done now would be to give notice three years in advance of a possible time, that after the lapse of three years we will proceed to give another notice which can then begin to run. It cannot begin to run now, as I understand article 33 of this treaty. It is to continue the ten years, and two years' notice may put an end to that portion of the treaty on which this debate is operative, but that notice cannot be made until ten years have elapsed; therefore, there is no mode of anticipating with diligence now the running of the notice. It is simply to brandish in the face of Great Britain—I do not say the menace, I believe that term was employed by some Senator—perhaps not that, but it is to brandish the intention, hinging the intention on the receipt of this money, to do a thing when the time comes which we cannot do now, and in respect of the doing of which many considerations may arise in the intervening time furnishing far more solid grounds than exist now for the action that may be taken, be it one way or be it the other.

But it is said—a Senator near me said in private discourse half an hour ago, more pointedly perhaps than I have heard it said in the debate—not exactly as the Senator from Ohio put it, quoting somebody, that we should be estopped if we did not speak; he did not go so far as that, but he said, "Suppose I rent a house, and I have been using it for years; I differ from the landlord; and I agree to refer the question; to leave it to a third person, and a sum is fixed as rent, and I pay it, and say nothing about it, is there not some implication that during the remaining years I occupy that house I will consider that the measure of value?" Well, I answered him as the honorable Senator from Ohio proceeded to answer, that if a man paid a judgment at the end of an execution in a contested matter, it could hardly be said that he had adopted as an act of his own judgment the measure of damages. But this may be distinguishable from that. If so, then, as some men sometimes say in indorsing a note, that they do it "without recourse;" let us say that this is without any intendment to flow from it that in the judgment of the party making this payment it is a fair measure of value; without any intendment that as to the future we still regard this as a measure or indication of that we ought to pay. For such an amendment I do not see why we might not vote, and why it would not stand the test of friendly or unfriendly criticism. But for us to say that, depending upon the acceptance of this money, we threaten now—for that is all it amounts to—that when the time comes we will give the notice for putting an end to this treaty, I humbly submit would be undignified, impolitic, and barren, an act from which no good would come, and which might lead to embarrassment in any one of several contingencies neither of which is by any means impossible.

Now, Mr. President, were this resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations never passed at all, I am not prepared to say what harm would come from that. The money is to be paid by a certain time. This resolution does not advance it unless it is to have some moral influence upon the constituents of the two Houses; it does not take one legislative step toward the payment of the money. That must be by a bill, which bill must undergo every process, with this resolution on our records, which awaits the bill without. It is a mere manifesto; it is a preamble. I know that Mr. Webster said the revolution was fought on a preamble, and perhaps the discussion on the bill which is to follow may be affected by the preamble; but in and of itself it has no practical effect; it is the mere expression of an opinion.

I shall vote for the resolution, although I hope that it will not occupy a great deal more time if, as I trust, we are to have a speedy adjournment; and I hope if it is to pass it will pass without being encumbered by any of the things to which I have referred or some other things to which I might refer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it does not appear to me that we are proceeding in exactly the right way about this business, with great respect to the committee. What the Senator from New York has said has convinced me more and more that the straightforward thing to do is to ascertain and decide in the first instance whether this award is justly binding upon us or not. If it is justly binding under the circumstances that attended it, then there is nothing to be said about it but to pay the money. If, in our opinion, it is not justly binding upon us, then it appears to me that the candor and good-will that we feel and owe to Great Britain should lead us to say so and hear what she has to say about it. That is the way it strikes me; and yet the committee has reported a resolution that does not express any opinion of the Senate at all upon this vital point, as it strikes me. If, as I have said, our opinion is one way, then we ought to do one thing; if our opinion is the other way, then we ought to do another thing as it seems to me. Then the first thing that we ought to ascertain is what our own opinion is frankly and fairly, and state it publicly, on the subject of the binding validity of this award. If it be binding, as I have said, we ought to pay it without any qualification; but I think we should still have a right, without being regarded as undignified, to say that we did not wish to occupy property any longer than we were obliged to do, on the same terms. It may be that the proprieties of diplomatic intercourse, the tenderness that we feel to a nation that is quite as great as we are and therefore cannot be considered as taking up a thing as a menace very easily, might authorize us to say what we thought, without the fear of being misunderstood.

I am not going to spend any time in going into the discussion of the three rules that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin have referred to. I agree in general with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that what is contained in the three rules is in substance and effect exactly what is contained in our act of 1818 on the subject of neutrality, is exactly what Mr. Adams insisted upon to the British government during the rebellion and during the very time when, through her want of diligence or in spite of her diligence, as the case may have been, the confederate cruisers were built, armed, manned, and sent forth to make war upon American commerce. So far as I understand, the principles of the act of 1818 are simply the principles that exist in these three rules; and there is not any great occasion for us therefore to complain of the existence of these three rules, although I agree with what the Senator from Maine has said that it is a very extraordinary thing that the government of her Majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, and so on—I will not take time to express her whole title—should have been so reluctant, as evidently it has been to do what the treaty proposes and binds the two contracting parties to do, and that is to invite the other friendly nations of the globe to agree to the same principles of international conduct in case of war. There is something very extraordinary about it.

Now, what I propose, Mr. President, because I think it right, is to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to consider and report whether in its opinion the award at Halifax is upon just principles of law binding upon the United States.

When I am informed of an answer to that question then I shall know, so far as I am concerned, exactly what I ought to do. If that committee report to us that in their opinion this award is not binding upon the United States upon just principles of law it will undoubtedly be upon such reasons as will convince the Senate of its correctness. If we are convinced of its correctness, then I am not in favor of paying the money at present. I might agree to pay it afterward, although there be no award at all. If the commissioners had never met, if Her Majesty's government had said, "Here, give us five million and a half and waive the trouble and expense of a trial about this business," possibly I could vote for it under certain circumstances; I do not exactly see what they are at the present moment, but it may be that I should. If, on the other hand, it is the judgment of Congress, founded upon the report of a responsible and able committee, that we have not yet had any award under these articles of this treaty, then there is no occasion for our making any provision for its payment until further communication; but if that committee shall report that this award is binding upon the principles that regulate the intercourse of nations and binds their consciences as private arbitration binds the honor and the conscience of a private citizen, then there is nothing for it but simply to appropriate the money without whining, as somebody has expressed it, or making wry faces about it. We have promised to pay it in that sense, then, and there is no occasion for doing anything else but pay it, having the right to express at that time or at any other time as it may be convenient (and not with reference to the payment of the money) that we shall exercise and direct our Chief Magistrate to exercise at the proper time the duty of terminating the provisions which, if they were to continue, would lead us into a similar liability in the future.

Therefore, and because, as my friend from New York has said, time is now precious, I move to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations with these instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to recommit with the instructions he has submitted.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us hear the instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed instructions will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations with instructions to consider and report whether in its opinion the award at Halifax is upon just principles of law binding upon the United States.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I hardly know the real duty which is devolved upon us. I appreciate the importance of time as all Senators do; but I feel still that there is some responsibility upon myself in relation to this matter which perhaps demands that I should occupy more of the time of this body than I otherwise would. I hardly know now, as I speak, whether I shall limit myself within five or ten minutes or an hour; but in whatever I may say, I do invoke the attention of Senators to the manner in which this question before us has been discussed.

There is no limit to the latitude of debate in this body, and there is nothing above the earth or beneath the sky that may not be talked about on any question that comes before us for our consideration; and when the Senator from Ohio gently suggested to my colleague that he was traveling a little out of the record, or, to use his own words, taking a pretty broad latitude, I thought the Senator from Ohio was correct; but when I listened to what the Senator from Ohio had to say, I thought he was equally obnoxious to the charge he had brought against my colleague, for I confess it required conceptions much keener than any that I possess to draw an inference or to see, even with a microscope stronger than any I ever gazed through, what on earth it had to do with this question, or what connection how it was proposed by anybody that we should divide the award of the Geneva tribunal could have with this question. I could not see that it had the slightest bearing upon this question. The Senator from Ohio knows, if he has not forgotten it, because it was a matter of frequent conference, that I concurred and agreed with him in opinion as to whom the great amount of that award should go; but that it has any earthly connection with the question that is now pending before this body, I repeat again, I fail to see; nor do I see that the discussion of the three rules named in the treaty of Washington has anything more to do with it, certainly very little more, than the point which the Senator from Ohio has brought into discussion here.

Now, let me bring the attention of the Senate—and I will try to do it in a few moments—back to the question which I think is fairly before the Senate; and I will state as briefly as I can the reasons which, in my judgment, ought to control us and the reasons that operated upon the minds of our committee and by which they arrived at their conclusion.

First I will submit an amendment to the motion which has been submitted by the Senator from Vermont. I move to strike out "Foreign Relations" and insert "the Judiciary." If we are going to ask for law opinions we want them from the Law Committee of this body. I shall therefore move to amend his motion in that way.

There is a great deal in this argument which I think is just ad captandum and no more. "If this award is valid, pay it; if it is not, do not pay it." That is a very simple way to place the question, and it disposes of it very easily. The view which the committee took was a little different from that, not quite so brief, perhaps not so wise, but it was the one which they did take. They said, first, that the President of the United States has communicated the papers in relation to this transaction to this body, and those papers are accompanied by a long communication from the Secretary of State, in which he has suggested precisely what the Committee on Foreign Relations are now seeking to carry out, to wit, that there are two points; and I say to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] that the third one to which he alludes has no foundation in fact. There can be no question as to the appointment of the third commissioner. I think I am justified in saying that, upon an examination of all the papers, our mouths at least ought to be closed in relation to the appointment of the third commissioner. That was the reason why the Committee on Foreign Relations made no allusion to it.

That brings me to the letter of the Secretary of State, in which he has given us the evidence upon which we are acting; and he says, first, that it is questionable, I do not know that he puts it quite as strongly as that, but he submits the suggestion whether the award is legal and binding, it having been signed by only two of the commissioners. A friend near me says that is all the point there is in it. I submit, and I think I shall convince his candid mind, that it is not all the point.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. All the legal point.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, there the Senator and myself agree. Now we are but one party to the question, and we are carrying out what was thought to be a great international principle of determining international questions by international tribunals; and it is in that light and in that view that we should approach this question and consider it; I think, in a wholly different light than if we were not a party to the attempt to introduce the settlement of international troubles by international tribunals.

We were but one party to this transaction. We may say we have the power—I will not use the word "right"—we may have the power to say that this award is invalid, and therefore not binding; but when we say it, we do not ask a conference with the other side; we do not seek to harmonize the different parties that are negotiating under international tribunals; but we arbitrarily say that this question we will decide for ourselves.

Now what does the President ask in the communication he makes to us submitting this matter for our consideration? I will read his language, so that I shall not misstate it:

> I respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress the record of the transaction, as presented upon the papers, and recommend an appropriation of the necessary sum with such discretion to the executive government in regard to its payment as, in the wisdom of Congress, the public interests may seem to require.

The papers come here with an outline made of the view of the Government, and it is published to the world, and he makes the two points, first as to the authority of the commission to decide, and second as to the amount of the award. The Committee on Foreign Relations did not undertake to express any opinion upon the first question, because they believed it more just, more proper, and wiser, to ask a conference with the other party to the transaction and leave it to the law department of our own Government to decide, when the question shall finally come, whether this is that legal decision which ought in good faith to be paid if we mean to preserve the honor and good faith of the nation.

Next was the question of excessive damages. There has been a great deal of talk here this morning in relation to that, and one Senator says that a protest is useless and it is illustrated in various ways; that when a judgment in court is recovered against us it is useless to protest, because it is the judgment of the court and must be paid. Begging Senators' pardon, the cases they put are not parallel and fail to have effect. This is a case where the award is for a limited period of time, and when the treaty which secures to us the rights to the in-shore fisheries shall expire, this thing comes up again like Banquo's ghost, and it will not down, however often we may bid it; and I affirm that if we pay it silently, if we pay it without saying one word of protest when we pay this award, we shall in the future be found embarrassed and troubled, we shall add to complications to that question which has stretched from the treaty of 1783 down to the present time, and it would seem is to be continuous and without end.

From these considerations your committee declined to express an opinion upon the legal and valid and binding force of the award. For the very reasons which I have stated they did recommend in as strong words as they could use, that it was wise and expedient to protest against this award. We affirm that there has been no fraud, but we think there may have been a mistake. Is there anything incompatible with the dignity of our Government in suggesting to a friendly power that we have that impression? Is there anything improper in suggesting to them that they should confer with us in relation to the legal and binding force of the award? I fail to see it entirely.

Again, Mr. President, this Government has stated its case to the world. It is in the letter of the Secretary of State. The Committee on Foreign Relations have followed as nearly as possible along the same path, and have adopted at least the same line of argument. I ask Senators to say that if in transacting and negotiating with foreign governments we can well afford, unless there be very strong reasons, to declare one line of action in the legislative department of the Government while the Executive is engaged in another. I would not follow the Executive's course if it were illegal; I would not follow that course if it were morally wrong; but in a case which I believe to be pre-eminently so just and proper as this, we add a strength to the Executive by standing side by side with it in the course which we shall see fit to take.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the Senate will in its wisdom believe that it will be best to adopt the course which the committee have suggested. The necessity of that course is to show to the world that we are in harmony with the views of the Executive Department as they have expressed them in relation to the subject. You cannot incorporate in a bill an argument. It is no place for it.

You can get a distinctive expression of the view of Congress, as I conceive, in no way, or in no way so well as to ask them to vote upon a resolution which seeks further negotiations between the United States and Great Britain upon the two distinct propositions that are named in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think there is a moral power in it, and it will have its effect. I do not undertake to express any opinion or belief as to what may be the ultimate result of this effort; but I am willing that our Government shall submit these facts, as they have been presented to us, to the consideration of the English government, and under the advice and direction of her own law officers, I have no doubt they will come to that conclusion in which the American public and people will acquiesce.

Mr. President, I could consume your time, I could go over the ground which has been occupied by others, but if I have been able to state my case and to state the basis or the reasons which have influenced the committee and the manner in which it has been presented here, I have answered my purpose. If I have not done it, I should fail to make a speech if I were to talk further to argue it. I hope, however, that we may proceed as soon as may be to vote upon the question, and I will ask all Senators (not that I would limit debate) to join with me in hastening a conclusion. I will only add, Mr. President, that if this matter is to be taken from the Senate now, I insist that it shall go, being a law question, to the Law Committee of the body, and not again to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate further on this question, but it has taken a new phase and I feel bound to say a very few words upon it.

It is now proposed to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations with instructions to report whether the award is binding, and it is said, and said truly, that if the award is binding the plain way is to pay, as the Senator from Vermont expressed it, without making wry faces about it. If it is not binding, the plain course is not to pay it at all, because we are satisfied that the award is erroneous. We might waive technicalities if we thought the award was just. We should not be in a very good position to insist on technicalities against a just award. But our Government and the whole Senate believe this award is unjust, and believing that, we cannot be bound in honor and good faith to pay it unless the award is binding. If it is binding, there is nothing to do but pay it, and to pay it as the Senator from Vermont has said without making wry faces about it. If it is not binding, then it is plainly our duty not to pay it. So, Mr. President, I was a little surprised when I heard the motion to recommit, because I had supposed that the Committee on Foreign Relations had decided that the award was binding. ["No!" "No!"] I was surprised to hear the chairman of that committee say they had not decided anything, because I could not for the life of me see how they could report a bill to pay it unless it was binding.

Mr. CONKLING. They have not reported a bill to pay it.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand perfectly well what the closing part of the bill means. Here is the bill, a very short one:

That the sum of five and one-half million dollars, in gold coin, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and placed under the direction of the President of the United States, with which to pay to the government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the fisheries commission, lately assembled at Halifax, in pursuance of the treaty of Washington.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will pardon me; I want to justify my correction. That is not the resolution under consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. I know; but that is the bill reported by this same committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand his assertion or I should not have corrected it.

Mr. THURMAN. Then there is added:

If, after correspondence with the British government, the President shall deem t his duty to make the payment without further communication with Congress.

I know there is that qualification there, but surely the committee never could have intended that the President of the United States should pay an award which, in the judgment of the committee, is not binding on this Government. I cannot imagine that the committee could ever have intended any such thing as that.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator will pardon me a moment.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. The committee did not seek to and did not decide that question: is the common law of the two nations binding? Does the civil law come in to relieve governments in national arbitration from the provisions of the common law? We have one or two lawyers upon the Committee on Foreign Relations; many of its members are not lawyers, and we did not seek to determine that question, but we leave it to the law officers of our Government. I ought to say, however, that the words which were designed to be put at the end of that bill, and were omitted, are contained in the report of the committee:

If the President of the United States shall, without further communication with Congress, deem that such payment shall be demanded by the honor and good faith of the nation.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, now, Mr. President, that does not relieve the matter, it seems to me. We can decide whether the honor and good faith of the nation require us to pay this award or not, and we decide that in an instant; for if we say the award is not binding on us, then it is clear that honor and good faith do not require us to pay it, since we all admit it is an unjust award. That is a great power here, and we ought not to relegate that question to the President of the United States or to anybody. I think, therefore, that I was quite right in supposing that the committee had examined the question and determined that we were bound by the award. If that question has never been determined, then I am willing for one, if that is thought to be the best course, that the resolution shall be recommitted, and it seems to me that the proper committee is the Committee on Foreign Relations, because that is supposed to be best acquainted with international law and with the treaties which this Government makes.

So much for that. I will not take any more time about that; but before I take my seat——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? I endeavored to get information from the Senator from Maine this morning in order to know how to vote upon the resolution which said that the views and recommendations of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations touching this award are hereby approved. Now, he says they have given no view, recommended nothing, and I do not know what we are to approve. I want the Senator from Ohio to tell me whether this is a mere sentimental resolution or whether it is to accomplish anything? I do not propose to vote a sentiment but to vote upon something that the committee ask us to approve.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend does not ask me that question.

Mr. BECK. I failed to get an answer from the Senator from Maine, and I want to get one now from the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HAMLIN rose.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to finish in one sentence before the Senator's colleague leaves the Chamber. I wish the attention of the Senator from Maine farthest from me, [Mr. BLAINE.] If I understood the Senator from Maine who sits farthest from me, he closed some remarks this morning with a statement that surprised me very greatly and that I can hardly think he would have made if he had reflected long enough upon the subject. I understood him to say—I hope he was mistaken—that notice had been given to the government of Great Britain that we no longer considered this article in the treaty establishing the three rules as in force.

Mr. BLAINE. No, I did not state that. I suppose a notice is something formal and official; that has not yet been resorted to. What I did say, and what I have understood, was that Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, did say in a letter to the minister from Great Britain, Sir Edward Thornton, that the concluding clause in regard to the three rules must be held to be indivisible, and that, Great Britain declining to join, according to her obligation, in recommending the rules to other nations, they would be treated as a nullity by our Government. That is what he said.

Mr. THURMAN. If Mr. Fish ever made such a declaration as that, he was very oblivious of his powers and his duties.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not attempting to quote anything; I am only stating what I have heard in quarters which I regard as entitled to the highest respect; and as soon as the pending matter is disposed of I intend to offer a resolution calling for the correspondence, and it will then, I think, be found that words to that effect were used officially by Mr. Fish in his correspondence with the British government.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot state what words were used except so far as they have been communicated to the Senate; and usually such correspondence is not communicated to the open Senate unless the President thinks it may be done without injury to the public service. I do not know, therefore, whether this correspondence is among the published correspondence open to everybody or not. If it is not, I do not know how it gets here. But this I have to say: here is a treaty that by its terms is binding for ten years; that treaty can be put an end to in one of several ways. War between us and Great Britain would put an end to it. Another treaty negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate would put an end to it. It may be it has been contended in this Government again and again that we may do what Congress did with respect to the French treaty of the Revolution, put an end to it by an act of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. I fear either that I have misunderstood the Senator from Ohio or he has misunderstood me. He did not understand me, I hope, as saying that I had ever heard that Mr. Fish said the whole treaty would be a nullity.

Mr. THURMAN. Or any part of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Merely this: that the government of Great Britain refusing to join in commending, as the treaty obligation requires her to do, the three rules to other maritime powers, this Government would treat them as a nullity respecting itself, but not touching any other part of the treaty. I never said anything of that sort.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well. I say the President or the Secretary of State had no more right to put an end to one article in a treaty than he has a right to put an end to the whole of it, and I can hardly conceive that the information of the Senator from Maine can be correct. I think Mr. Fish was too prudent and circumspect a man to have undertaken to assume powers that he certainly did not possess.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think Mr. Fish——

Mr. THURMAN. I beg not to be interrupted. I shall be done in a moment, and I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate.

I can conceive a case in which the President, from the very necessity of the case, must determine, and determine on the instant, whether he will consider this Government bound by a treaty or not. The conduct of a government may be such that the President in vacation, when no Congress or Senate is in session, may be compelled ex necessitate rei to determine instantly whether this Government will consider the provisions of a treaty binding or not; but that the President can, when Congress is in session or when the Senate is in session, assume to decide for himself and for this Government that the Government will not carry out the provisions of a solemn treaty made by this Executive and ratified by the Senate, I utterly deny.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, all that I have ever understood that Mr. Fish said was what as a prudent man and careful Secretary and very painstaking official he was bound to say. Let me read again the clause of the treaty:

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers and to invite them to accede to them.

Mr. Fish, I have understood, said to Sir Edward Thornton that the obligation contained in that paragraph was indivisible, and that it was not for Great Britain to hold us to it, and refuse to join with us in asking other nations to accede to it. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio differ with Mr. Fish in this position?

Mr. THURMAN. I have expressed no opinion upon that at all, whether it is divisible or indivisible.

Mr. BLAINE. It does not require any opinion to be expressed whether it is divisible or indivisible. It is so on its face; it is a copulative conjunction that joins them together and unites them as one duty. It is a mere question of the English language and Lindley Murray's parsing. I certainly did not wish to state here any rumor that assigned to Mr. Fish the performance of an act that was not in the highest degree prudent and in the highest degree patriotic, for I think his whole course was that of a most prudent and patriotic Secretary; but I think he would have been lacking in the spirit which he always possessed if he had not said to Sir Edward Thornton, "You cannot hold us to that part of the treaty which is of advantage to you and deny to us that part which is of advantage to us." That is all Mr. Fish said and he ought to have said it. He could not properly have said less.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think when we get the correspondence—and before that time of course we are merely speculating in a certain sense, or ought to be, as to what it is—it will be found that Mr. Fish has not done what the Senator from Ohio understood the Senator from Maine to impute to him.

Mr. THURMAN. I impute nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I say what the Senator from Ohio understood the Senator from Maine to impute to him; but it will only be found that Mr. Fish, very properly and very likely with conclusive reasoning, brought to the attention of the agents of the British government the circumstance that if Great Britain omitted or declined, upon frequent request, to unite in inviting the maritime powers to also subscribe to these rules, there might be good ground to hold on the part of the Government of the United States that the three rules would not be binding as between these two powers.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that, too, but I think the Senator from Vermont will find that the Secretary of State did not put it quite as gingerly as that. I think he said it a little more plainly than that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That we can tell better when we can see it.

Mr. BLAINE. When we get the correspondence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will be found that the Secretary of State has not usurped any authority whatever, but that whatever he did on that occasion every American citizen when he comes to see it will approve of.

So much reference has been made to the appointment of the Belgian minister and in a certain sense in a way to seem to reflect upon the industrious and wise action of the Secretary of State, that I wish to state what I have good reason to believe was the history of that affair.

This treaty having made these provisions, on the 1st of July, 1873, legislation having been obtained on both sides, (the latest on the part of the United States in March, 1873,) the fishery clauses went into operation that day, and the ninety days that the treaty refers to within which the two governments were to agree upon the third commissioner, began to run, and in the failure of that agreement within the ninety days then the Austrian minister at the court of St. James was to name the third commissioner. Between March and July, 1873, Mr. Fish had many conversations with Sir Edward Thornton, as shown by the published statements, that are known everywhere, upon that subject, with a view to an agreement upon a third commissioner, when the term of ninety days should arrive. In the course of these, Sir Edward Thornton asked Mr. Fish to assent to the name of Mr. Delfosse, but Mr. Fish declined.

On the 7th of July, 1873, Mr. Davis, the Assistant Secretary of State, by direction of Mr. Fish, in letter No. 1, Executive Document—I am now referring to public documents—proposed the name of every chief in the diplomatic corps at Washington who could speak English, except Sir Edward, Count Corti, Mr. Delfosse, and the Portuguese minister. He stated that the last two were omitted because "by reason of the peculiar connection of their governments with Great Britain, they would probably esteem themselves disqualified for the position." The full purport of this expression may be understood by referring to paragraphs 4, 5 and 6, on page 5 of the Senate document, and to paragraph 4 on page 12 of that document, which is published in our archives.

On the 19th of August, 1873, Sir Edward Thornton replied by proposing Mr. Delfosse. He had received instructions to propose him, had cabled that Mr. Fish would not accept him, and had been ordered to propose him nevertheless. See letter No. 3 on page 4 of the same document already cited. On the 21st of August, 1873, Mr. Fish replied declining again to accept Mr. Delfosse assigning as a reason the political relations between Belgium and Great Britain. See letter No. 4 in that same series.

Sir Edward Thornton declined to accept any of the names mentioned by Mr. Davis in the letter referred to, on the ground that the government of Canada objected to the appointment of any foreign minister residing in Washington. See letter No. 5, in these documents.

Mr. Fish objected to these proceedings as a violation of the spirit of the treaty and invited the British government to try to agree upon the third commissioner. See letter No. 6, pages 6, 7, and 8.

Sir Edward Thornton proposed, under instructions, that the ministers of the United States and Great Britain at The Hague should agree upon the third commissioner. That will be found in letter No. 8 in the same documents. Mr. Fish declined this, regarding it as a violation of the treaty as agreed to by the Senate, in which he was of course quite right. The Senate had given him no authority to make that provision.

On the 3d of October, 1873, the ninety days having expired, Mr. Fish proposed that nevertheless the two governments should waive the lapse of time and endeavor to agree on the third commissioner. That will be found in this same correspondence, letter 11. Great Britain rejected this as inconsistent with the treaty. That will be found in the same correspondence, letter No. 13.

After the discussion in these notes numbers 14, 15, and 16, as they appear in the documents, the subject was dropped. Soon afterward Mr. Rothery arrived here from London and Mr. Brown from Canada, the Dominion agent, and opened negotiations for a reciprocity treaty with Canada in place of the fishery clauses of the treaty of Washington. In consequence of the action of the Senate, these negotiations were unsuccessful, as we all know.

On the 21st of April, 1875, Sir Edward Thornton renewed the request for a joint request to the Austrian embassador at London to appoint the third commissioner. That will appear in the documents I have referred to, at page 18.

On the 8th of May, 1876, after a considerable correspondence which I believe is not in the Senate documents—I will not state for what reasons, but confidential reasons no doubt—Mr. Fish assented to negotiate for the form of the proposed request, which under the treaty it was his duty to do undoubtedly. Mr. Fish still endeavored to induce the British government to arrive at an understanding by which the services of Count Beust, the Austrian embassador, would have been dispensed with. In this he was always foiled.

In February, 1877, Mr. Delfosse's name being again suggested by Sir Edward Thornton, Mr. Fish agreed that he might be named by Count Beust, the Austrian embassador, for the place. Mr. Fish was induced to do this by the conviction that it was better to have Mr. Delfosse, who was known, objectionable as the appointment was on account of the political relations between Belgium and England, rather than trust to an unknown appointment to be made in London by a person subjected to British influence.

That, Mr. President, on looking through these documents, you will see is a correct statement of the history of this affair, and whatever untoward result may have come to us from the selection of Mr. Delfosse, we do not know that a still worse one would not have come from the selection of some other person by the Austrian embassador at London; and there is no ground in my opinion to criticise the intelligence, or the fidelity, or the wisdom of Mr. Fish in at last taking the alternative of this high-minded and honorable Belgian, whatever may have been the political bias and influence to which he had been subjected, rather than trust to an unknown exploration upon an unknown sea put forward by the Austrian Minister at the Court of St. James.

Now, Mr. President, one word on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] and I shall have done, and I trust finally. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. This is purely a diplomatic question; I do not mean a question of negotiation, but a question of public law. It may be that the principles of municipal jurisprudence of the two countries will have a great deal to do with it, but it is a question of public law between two nations; and I am sure, composed as the Committee on Foreign Relations is, that we could not find a better committee in this body, indeed I think we could not find one nearly so well adapted to consider and report its opinion to us on this question as that committee.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is manifest that the Senate is not in a condition to vote directly upon this question; that we need the opinion of the law committee on the subject before we vote. It is not only a diplomatic question, as the Senator from Vermont presents it, but it is a question of international law which we should first decide. We should decide whether by the terms of the treaty this award is binding, or whether upon principles of international law it is binding, the treaty not providing for it. Under these circumstances I hope that the Senate will send the question to the Judiciary Committee that we may have a law opinion upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will give me his ear, I will endeavor to answer the question which he submitted. The object of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, and I think if the Senator will read their report carefully he will find that it is stated with tolerable clearness, to confer with the British government first upon the legality of the award as named in the second paragraph of the report on the second page. There the committee state the fact that the award was signed by only two, and the additional fact that as to the other commissions provided for in the treaty of Washington it contained a provision that a majority should act. The paragraph concludes:

> But, in the judgment of your committee, it would not be wise or expedient for the United States to refuse to pay the award on this ground, if the British government, after the subject shall have been brought to its attention—

By our Executive. Therefore the committee understand that they recommend distinctly a reference of that subject to the consideration of the two powers; and then follows a discussion upon the fishery award, stating its excessive amount, and discussing it; and on page 5, at the conclusion of the first paragraph on that page, are these words:

> Your committee therefore recommend that the facts connected with this award be fairly and fully submitted to the government of Her Britannic Majesty.

Then follows a paragraph protesting against the excessive award as having no binding effect in the future as to the true value of the privilege conceded. Now these are the subjects which it is proposed by the committee shall be discussed in the nature of negotiation rather than settled by legislation; and there is the whole difference in the matter.

Mr. BECK. I believe I have read this report over and I have read the letter of the Secretary of State, and I heard the statement of the Senator from Maine, and they have failed to express my views. I believe his last statement has given me more information than I was able to obtain before, and I am very much obliged to him.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am happy that I have succeeded so far. I hope this matter will not be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but sent to the law committee of the Senate if it is committed at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall feel bound to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine changing the reference from the committee of which he is chairman to the committee the chairman of which proposes to recommit the resolution. I shall feel bound, however, even if that amendment prevails, to vote against referring this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary; and among my reasons is one which I beg to state.

To send this matter to the Foreign Relations Committee for the purpose indicated, or to any other, means that there is to be no appropriation made in season to pay this award.

Mr. INGALLS. When is it due?

Mr. CONKLING. In November, and the forthcoming session of Congress will meet in December. In order to pay it in November, after the questions now moved are passed on, the bill that lies on the table must be taken up here or it must originate in the House, in the House must go to the Committee of the Whole as every appropriation bill must do, and must find its way through the two Houses and be signed by the President. Unless that is done this award will not be paid, no matter how just it may be, no matter how advantageous to us it may be to see that no shortcoming occurs on our part.

When we vote to commit this matter to either of these committees with the view stated in the motion to refer, I think we must vote practically that this award shall not be paid as it has been agreed to be paid, if ever. I am not prepared to do that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the attention of the Senate for but a very few minutes. If Senators had done the Committee on Foreign Relations the justice to read their report, they would have known what it was they were asked to indorse by adopting the resolution that is now before the Senate. That has not been done, I apprehend, from the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky; and, at the risk of being tedious to the Senate, I will endeavor to state briefly what the committee have recommended.

They set out by giving a brief statement touching the formation of the treaty, the provisions relating to the subject-matter of the fisheries, and the organization of the arbitrators to pass upon the amount to be paid, if any, by this Government. They state clearly, briefly, that the award was agreed to by but two of the arbitrators, the third refusing to agree, and thus there is presented to the Senate the question whether or not an award made as this one was made is an award that we ought to stand by. The Foreign Relations Committee present that question to the Senate. How was this arbitration organized? The treaty does not provide that a majority of the arbitrators may determine what the award shall be. In regard to the Geneva award it was so provided. The committee submit to the Senate whether or not they will abide by that award. They make a recommendation, to which I confess I agree with some reluctance, in these words:

> But, in the judgment of your committee, it would not be wise or expedient for the United States to refuse to pay the award on this ground—

That is, on the ground that but two of the arbitrators agreed to it. The committee then say it would not be wise to refuse to pay the money on that ground—

> if the British government, after the subject shall have been brought to its attention, claim that, in their judgment, the award is made in accordance with the terms of the treaty and in conformity with sound principles of law.

Whether that be right or not, that is the recommendation of the committee. That is what the Senate is asked, either to affirm or deny upon that point. There is no obscurity about it; there cannot be any misunderstanding about it. The plain recommendation of the committee is that whether this award be in accordance with the strict rules of law or not, it is better for us to pay it than not to pay it. The Senate I apprehend is just as well prepared to pass upon that question now as it will be after the matter goes back to the committee again. Admitting that this is not in strict accordance with the terms of the treaty, is it best for us to pay it or not? That is a question to be submitted. It is a qestion about which wise men will differ. One of the first international lawyers of the country, President Woolsey, I understand, has published his opinion that the award is in strict accordance with the terms of the treaty. Other gentlemen entertain different opinions. Different opinions are entertained here upon the legal question. The legal question is presented directly to the Senate for their determination: shall we agree to the award or not on this ground?

I do not think it is worth while to consume any more time in regard to it. If we think it is better to say that we will not stand by the award on that ground, let us say so and end it. If, however, we choose to say that it is a matter about which there is this difference of opinion, and there well may be difference of opinion, and it is better for us, saving in that way the principle of arbitration, to pay the money, although we may think the matter irregular, then let us say so.

The committee then set out very briefly and very clearly the question as to the nature of the damages. In the judgment of the committee they are excessive, grossly excessive, and they recommend touching that point that that matter also be the subject of negotiation between our Government and the British government. They then take care to provide that for the future twelve years that this treaty is to run, if this money is paid, it shall not stand as the measure of damages for the remaining years of that term; and having made these recommendations that if the British government insist upon the legality of the arbitration we will not refuse to pay the money upon that account; that the question of the amount of the damages shall be a subject of negotiation between our Government and the British government, and the affirmation that it shall not stand as a measure for future damages if paid, leaves the matter in the hands of the President of the United States, with the money in his hands also, to say whether he will pay it or not.

I do hope, in view of the vote we have taken to-day to adjourn on the 17th, that we shall act upon this matter at once and get rid of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out "the Committee on Foreign Relations" and insert "the Committee on the Judiciary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont as amended, which is to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion, as amended, will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions "to consider and report whether in its opinion the award at Halifax is, upon just principles of law, binding upon the United States."

Mr. MORRILL. A single word. I have not a particle of doubt that this award is voidable on its face for not having been agreed to by all of the arbitrators, and yet I am decidedly in favor of paying the money and paying it at once. I would, however, have no objection to indicating that this is not to be the measure of what we consider to be the value of those fisheries.

Mr. President, this is an old question with me. I have discussed it in this body and in the other. I have not a particle of doubt but what the considerations that we gave are equal and more than equal to all that we received. The very fact that the conditions we are under after the treaty make the fisheries of less value than they were before is a sufficient evidence upon that point. But at the same time I am in favor of paying the money. I would not quibble about it. I think it is beneath the dignity of the country to undertake to avoid the payment of this sum on account of a technicality.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator call it a technicality if the true spirit of the treaty calls for three instead of two?

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me that we agreed to submit this question to a board of arbitration. Two of that board have decided against us; and under those circumstances it would seem to me to be the best policy on the present occasion for us to vote to pay the money.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont one question which has just been suggested, whether the language of the treaty requires a unanimous concurrence of the commissioners?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Indiana of course has read the treaty as I have. He will find that in one portion of the treaty the entire board is required in order to make up an award, and in the other it is not mentioned except as a board.

Mr. WITHERS. I am in favor of paying the amount which has been found as damages by this commission. We agreed to refer this matter to these arbitrators. From what I can understand, the difficulty arises from the fact that no provision was inserted in the agreement by which it was provided whether unanimity should be necessary to constitute the award, or whether a majority of the commission should control it. The provisions of the common law, as I learn from the learned gentlemen on the other side, require that in such cases there shall be unanimity. The question for us, it seems to me, is whether we, as the Senate of the United States, shall shelter ourselves behind that provision of the common law, when there was no requirement whatever in the agreement which was made at the time these commissioners were appointed, and when the fact is notorious that as to the Geneva award it was provided that a majority of the commissioners should decide. If that be the true state of the case, it seems to me that we shall be departing from our position and dignity if we attempt to haggle over this little difficulty arising from the provision of the common law. But if the award be greater than is just, as I verily believe it to be, I consider that we had much better pay it at once, appropriate the requisite money, and be done with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as amended.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes 27.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything upon this subject, but still I trust the Senate will indulge me for three or four minutes while I give the reasons why I shall vote in favor of the payment of the sum awarded by the commission.

I understand that by the treaty of Washington a new departure was made. A new era, in other words, was inaugurated in regard to the settlement of international disputes. The governments of Great Britain and the United States agreed that they would refer to a tribunal selected by themselves questions that were disputed and which would not be settled otherwise than by an appeal to arms. I understand that some of these questions have been settled and that the sums awarded to be paid have been delivered over by one party to the other; and now the Government of the United States, having accepted the sum awarded at Geneva, is called upon to determine whether it will pay the sum awarded by the commissioners agreed upon by the two governments for a settlement of these fishery claims.

The sum awarded by two of the commissioners is not, in the opinion of the committee of this body or in my opinion, justly awarded against the United States; but has it ever been the case where a dispute has arisen between two persons or between two governments that the one who has lost in the dispute is satisfied with the judgment of the tribunal to which he has appealed? I say no. It seems to me that we should at once accept this decision and pay the sum, for the reason that this question reaches far beyond the mere merits of this particular case. It is a matter of greater importance to the people and to the Government of the United States, it seems to me, to pay this money than the mere sum itself indicates, for we have inaugurated and endeavored to bring to the attention of mankind this method of settling disputes. If we shall insist that the nation against whom an award may be made shall in all cases be satisfied or that the commissioner of its government who may be selected shall agree to it, we shall find that this method of settling international disputes will never be adopted by the governments of the world. For that reason I shall vote for the payment of this award, and in reference to future cases rather than to this particular case.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if it is his purpose, in case this resolution should be adopted, to urge the immediate consideration of the bill for the payment of the award.

Mr. HAMLIN. It was not my purpose to ask the attention of the Senate to that bill immediately; but of course if the resolution shall pass the bill will be called up at the proper time for the action of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The reason I inquired was to enable me to decide what course I should pursue. There are some things that have not been said which I think ought to be said on this proposition; but if the bill is not to be urged now I shall refrain and let the resolution be acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate will not be called upon to vote on the bill now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate for more than a few moments.

We are called upon by the President of the United States to make an appropriation of five millions and a half for the purpose of paying what is supposed to be an award. That message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, and that committee have reported to us recommending that we make the appropriation, but accompanying their recommendation with certain suggestions which naturally lead to the inquiry whether it is proper and right to make the appropriation which they recommend. They report two or three suggestions in reference to that award. One is that it is exorbitant. So far as I am concerned, that suggestion has no consideration. If the judgment was rendered by a proper tribunal, the question of an exorbitant award has nothing to do with a determination of the question. But they do suggest another question, a question as to the competency of the tribunal which undertook to render a valid judgment. I find that the Secretary of State, in the letter which has been transmitted by the President to the Senate, and which was referred to the committee, makes a similar suggestion. In order that I may not misrepresent him, I will read from his letter. The Secretary of State says:

> It will be quite competent for Congress, in considering an appropriation to meet the proper obligations of the Government under the treaty, to waive or to insist upon this objection to the validity of the award of the commission for non-conformity to the requirements of the treaty.

The Secretary of State says that that is a competent question for Congress to consider. The committee to whom his letter was referred evidently coincided with the opinion of the Secretary of State that it is a question which we ought to consider, because they bring it to our attention. I ask, when we are advised, both from the executive department of the Government and from the committee of our own body which has cognizance of this matter, that there is a question as to the validity of the award, is it not proper and right, is it not our bounden duty to inquire into the question of the binding obligation of that so-called award before we appropriate the money out of the Treasury to pay it? For that reason it was that I voted for the motion offered to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee, in order that we might have the judgment of the Legal Committee of this body as to whether we ought to pay this money. I am ready to pay the money and to pay it at once if that is the judgment of the Senate. If in the judgment of our Law Committee it is our duty to appropriate it, I will vote to appropriate it at once; but as a Senator bound to guard the interests of the people of this country, as well as to guard its honor, the question arises with me whether I ought to vote to appropriate a single dollar after I have been advised not only by the Secretary of State but by the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, that there is a question as to the validity of the judgment that was rendered by this tribunal.

The inquiry starts in my mind as to whether I am at liberty to vote away the money out of the Treasury until that question is settled, and here in this Senate is the proper place to settle it.

I utterly repudiate the idea that is thrown out both in the message of the President itself and in the letter of the Secretary of State and in the report of the committee, that the President, after the money is put into his hands, should quibble over this question. The President says, in making his recommendation, that the question of payment should be left to the discretion of the President. I do not concur in that view. The Secretary of State in his letter advances the same idea, and so does the committee which has made this report: that the money should be placed in the hands of the President, and that then should begin a correspondence with the British government with reference to this question.

Sir, I do not believe that the President of the United States, if this money is appropriated, ought ever by the faintest suggestion to convey to the British government that in our judgment we ought not to pay it. If we ought to pay it, we ought to appropriate the money and let it be paid without demurrer at any time. If we ought not to pay it, this body is the place where it should be stopped, not the executive department.

I should be glad if the motion to refer this resolution to the Judiciary Committee had prevailed on the division taken. I think that it ought to prevail. I think we ought to have the judgment of the Judiciary Committee as to the binding obligation of that award upon the people of this country. Without it, we are in the dark, except as we are guided by our individual judgments.

Mr. President, I do not intend to trespass longer upon the attention of the Senate; but I was not willing that the vote should be taken on this question without at least submitting to the Senate the views which I entertain upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now ask the Senate to vote upon the question.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I desire to say but a single word in reference to the question before the Senate.

A so-called award has been made by arbitrators in a controversy between the two governments of Great Britain and the United States. The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate informs us that that award is extremely exorbitant, out of all reason, and so exorbitant that in any controversy between individuals in a court of justice its very exorbitancy would lead to the strongest suspicion and furnish evidence that improper influences were used to bring about that award which would make it null and void.

Mr. HAMLIN. I said no such thing.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Now the Senator from Maine says that he said no such thing. I am talking about not what the committee say in express terms but what the figures they furnish indicate. I say the figures furnished by them indicate that what I have stated is correct. We have no evidence before us that improper influences were used in procuring that award, but it seems to me from the facts stated in the report that such must have been the case, that the cunning secrets of diplomacy were used in a manner in which they had no right to be used to effect the result which has been reached.

Not only that, but it is admitted by the committee, and I understand from this debate that it is suggested by the Executive, that the validity of this award is donbtful because it was not made with the unanimity of the arbitrators; that it was made by but two of the arbitrators when there were three of them. I understand further that there was in the treaty so far as this matter was concerned no provision that a majority of the arbitrators should make a binding award. The governments of Great Britain and the United States are both subject, so far as their territory is concerned, to the common law. It is presumed, at least I choose to presume in this case, that this treaty was made by them in the light of that common law under which this country so far as back to the beginning of its existence and England back to the remotest period of her history have lived.

Mr. President, I think it exceedingly proper that before taking this large sum from the Treasury of the United States a committee of this body should decide for us, or at least examine the question, whether or not there is anything about the manner in which this award was made that would render it invalid. For one, sir, if that is the case, I am prepared to take the responsibility, and to say for myself and for those whom I represent that that award shall not be paid. I recognize the fact that it is for the interest of humanity and for the interest of peace the world over that nations should submit their controversies to arbitration; but the example of one arbitration corrupted by influences which produce unjnst and exorbitant decisions would do more to break down arbitration between nations than anything else. If it is held that no matter how extravagant the award, no matter by what influences it apparently was obtained, it must be held valid by that nation against whom it is made, then there is an end to any arbitration in the future, for no nation will dare to put itself in the range of such influences.

Senators say here that the exorbitancy of this award has nothing to do with the question whether we shall pay it. Suppose this award had been $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $150,000,000, should we have been bound by it? No, sir; the exorbitance of the award itself would have furnished the strongest reason for us to say that there must have been influences connected with it which were improper. It does seem to me, although the case presented by the report of the committee of the Senate is not such an extreme case as that, that still it does present to us extremely strong evidence that in the obtaining of this award the agents of the British government or somebody used influences which in any court of justice would upset any award that had been made.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, as an earnest inquirer after the truth in this matter, whether he has any facts in his possession to sustain the broad and extremely grave charge of corrupt influences in the procurement of this award? If so, I think it is due to the rest of us, who are not so well advised perhaps as we ought to be, to be informed on that point.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I have nothing except what appears upon the report of the committee of the Senate. That report shows me that by this award the American Government is required to pay an enormous sum annually for a benefit which is but trivial and slight, and which the British government years ago offered to us for simply what I understand they have had under this treaty already.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Hampshire will appreciate the fact that the charge which he makes is a very grave one and one which is brought to bear upon three men. Those men of course have their character to sustain or they have not; one or the other. I do not know about this question; but I was struck with the charge that was made by the Senator from New Hampshire that corrupt influences had procured this award.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The report of what I said will show that I made no such charge.

Mr. VOORHEES. The report of what the Senator said will show that he did make such a charge, in my judgment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The report of my remarks will show that I said the facts stated in the report of the committee of the Senate indicated that an award had been made so exorbitant that it raised a strong suspicion in my mind at least that secret diplomatic influences had been used to bring that about which in a court of law would upset the award. The Senator says that I charged corruption; but I charged no such thing.

Mr. VOORHEES. That was the word the Senator used.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is not necessary in a court of law that corruption should have been employed in order to invalidate an award. An arbitrator may not talk or communicate with either of the parties except in the presence of the other or his counsel and still render the award liable to be set aside. In this case, when I look at the amount awarded, and when I see the facts presented to our consideration by the committee of the Senate, I do not hesitate to repeat again, and make myself responsible for what I have said already——

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Hampshire forgets, however, what he has said already. I am not seeking to make any point on the Senator from New Hampshire; I am seeking to elicit information, but the Senator from New Hampshire did stigmatize this as an award obtained by corrupt influences in words, in those very words. When the Senator now says that he spoke of the diplomatic and secret influences he substitutes language for that which he used before I interrupted him, and I am willing that the unrevised and uncorrected report of his remarks may be the arbiter between him and me.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I shall make no alteration of a word, or a syllable, or a letter, in what I said; or of a comma. The RECORD will show to-morrow just what I did say. If it shows that I made a charge against the British government of using corrupt influences to obtain this award, which I believe to be unjust, then, sir, I will say that in the warmth of the moment I said what I did not intend. One thing which I did say was, and I repeat it, that nothing would so tend to break down the whole system of international arbitration as to have it understood that a nation that went into an arbitration of this kind was bound by any award, whatever it might be, that could be procured.

Mr. HILL. I have but one remark to make upon this whole question after this prolonged debate. There is but one question in the case, in my judgment, and that is, has there been an award? If there has been an award in law and in fact, that ends the question; we ought to pay it. Of course if there was clear and irrefragable evidence that there was corruption used in procuring the award, we ought not to pay it. But I do not understand that there is such evidence, whatever suspicions there may be, and without such evidence we ought not to express such suspicions. Then the question as to whether there has been an award or not is not a question of fact, it is a question of law.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If it should become apparent that the arbitrators took into consideration matters that were not properly laid before them and that their judgment was influenced upon this question by the consideration of other questions which were not properly submitted to them, would the obligation to pay the award be sustained?

Mr. HILL. Oh, there is no trouble in answering that question. Of course it would not be valid.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Secretary of State in his letter which has been sent to us from the President states that upon his examination of this subject he is satisfied that they did take into consideration matters which were not properly referred to them.

Mr. HILL. Then we ought to have the evidence of that fact. Unquestionably the authority of the arbitrators cannot go beyond the questions submitted to them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In order that I may not misrepresent what the Secretary of State says, I shall beg the pardon of the Senator from Georgia while I read his language:

> The result, however, of my examination of the case satisfies me that the two commissioners must have taken into account some very indefinite and quite illusory elements of calculation, wholly outside of the narrow submission of the treaty, in order to bring out the weighty balance of advantage to the United States which their award expresses.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will allow me to say that there is nothing in that statement but the expression of a suspicion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Secretary of State says that it is the result of his examination.

Mr. HILL. The Secretary of State has communicated to us no fact to justify the expression of that suspicion. If he has communicated a suspicion in order that this Senate may inaugurate an investigation to ascertain whether that suspicion is well founded, then we ought to inaugurate that investigation; but there is no fact before us; there is none stated by the Secretary of State. He merely states that he has concluded as the result of his investigation that there must have been questions considered by the arbitrators that were outside of those submitted. Why does he conclude so? It is a mere conclusion of his mind. He states no fact on earth to sustain the conclusion. Unquestionably, I repeat, if the arbitrators have made what purports to be an award outside of the authority committed to them, it is no award; but before you can attack an award upon the ground that it is beyond the authority, as the lawyers say, ultra vires, and before likewise you can attack an award on the ground that corrupt means have been used to procure it inside of the authority, you must have facts. That makes up an issue of fact for a jury, and it must be passed upon, and the facts must be produced.

It is unwise even in a court of law, to make charges of fraud or of want of authority, which you have no facts to sustain. I protest that the Secretary of State ought not to be giving us simply the result of his conclusion which amounts in fact to a guess, to a mere supposition, unless he accompanies it with the facts to sustain it. Having given us his conclusions, it might have been very just and proper for us to have instituted an inquiry as to the truthfulness of his suspicion, as to the facts, to justify that suspicion. But in the absence of any distinct charge and proof of fraud in procuring the award inside of the authority of the arbitrators, in the absence of any fact going to show that the arbitrators did go beyond the authority that was submitted to them, the simple question is, did they make an award?

I come back to the proposition which I was stating when the Senator from Delaware interrupted me. The question in this case, as far as I understand it, whether there is an award or not, is one of law.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me a question? Supposing it to be one of law and our Government decides one way honestly, and the British government the other way, should we not pay it?

Mr. HILL. Well, that depends upon circumstances. That question of law itself might be a matter of negotiation between the two governments and might be a matter itself of reference.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the very thing proposed. It is proposed to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HILL. I was going on to say that it is a question of law whether there has been an award. That question of law arises in the fact, patent upon the papers, that the three arbitrators have not concurred, that what purports to have been an award was made by two, and not by three. The common-law rule upon that subject is very simple and very plain. I am not going into it. I do not think that we are bound to pay what purports to be an award because two of three have said so.

Mr. KERNAN. Nor I. My point is that if one party holds that it is a good legal award on this submission and the other holds not, and if we have got to say our decision shall rule and they say theirs shall rule, there is an end of the matter.

Mr. HILL. Then the two nations are at variance on the question of law, just as they were before the first submission on the question of fact. As they have agreed upon arbitrators to settle the question of fact as to what was just compensation in this case, why not resort to proper methods to settle whether this was in point of law an award and to settle the question of law? Why not do that? I think this matter is very important in the view suggested by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from New Hampshire. This system that has been inaugurated, as we say and boast, by the Geneva tribunal of settling disputes between nations by awards instead of by a resort to arms is a very beautiful thing; it marks, as the Senator from Tennessee has justly said, an era in the history of nations, if it can be inaugurated and carried out. It is all very proper. Differences of opinion will arise in executing that, as in carrying out any other matter. A difference does arise here, and the difference is one of law, I repeat, in the absence of the fact, and that difference is whether, when a submission has been made by two governments in the manner this submission was made, and only two of the arbitrators concur and the other dissents, that amounts to an award. In view of the complete and perfect operation of this new rule, it is very important that that question itself should be settled. Of course every lawyer practicing under the common-law rule knows very well that is not a binding award. If it is not a binding award we ought not to pay it. If it is a binding award we ought to pay it. Is it possible we cannot ascertain whether it is a binding award or not? Is not the legal ability of the Senate equal to the task of determining whether it is an award or not? If it is an award, pay it; if it is not an award, do not pay it, unless you choose to pay it.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Committee on Foreign Relations to express the opinion that, although technically two of three commissioners cannot make an award, yet that fact ought not to stand in the way of our paying the award, there being no other difficulty.

Mr. HILL. I cannot understand the philosophy of that. If we agree to pay an award, and no award has been rendered, what do you want to pay for?

Mr. WHYTE. That would be one case.

Mr. HILL. The case is simply not decided.

Mr. EATON. My friend is mistaken. The committee have not said that two out of three are not able to make an award. The committee have said no such thing. By every principle of international law it is understood that two can make an award; but by the common law I agree that Great Britain and the United States cannot; and therefore we leave this matter open for negotiation between the two governments.

Mr. ALLISON. Although the committee recommend, notwithstanding, that the appropriation should be made.

Mr. EATON. We do not.

Mr. ALLISON. It is to be a question for negotiation, as I understand.

Mr. HILL. I have to say this: if this is an award we ought to pay it without further controversy. I have been betrayed into saying a great deal more than I intended, by interruptions. I simply rose to say that in my judgment, as this is a question of law whether there is an award or not, we ought to refer it to the Judiciary Committee and have a report upon it. I do think so. Upon the decision the vote was against such a reference, but I hope that vote will be reconsidered when the yeas and nays are called. I do submit to the Senate that this is too grave a matter to be hurrying about. If it is not an award let us have the judgment of the Judiciary Committee on it. We have an able Judiciary Committee. If that committee should say that in their judgment under the international law, as was said by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] it is an award, I am willing to pay it without any further contest. If the Judiciary Committee, able as it is, shall say that it is not an award, of course then we ought not to pay it without further negotiation. We ought to have it settled between this Government and the government of Her Majesty whether it is or is not an award. The question ought to be settled in view of future complications, in view of future questions; it ought to be settled now, and there ought to be a mutuality of understanding between Great Britain and the United States as to whether two out of three can make an award.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is just what we want to do.

Mr. HILL. It ought to be distinctly understood between the two governments whether two can make an award.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator will pardon me, that is precisely the thing that we want to do. Instead of taking the question into our hands and determining it, we want to invite a conference with Great Britain and see what her views are.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before we have any opinion of our own?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; before we express any opinion of our own publicly.

Mr. HILL. I say to the Senator from Maine very frankly that I will qualify my position. I heard gentlemen state around me that we ought to pay the award and say nothing about it. If the object is to have a conference with the British government to ascertain whether it is an award or not, I concur that the Senator is right.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is all there is.

Mr. HILL. I concur with the Senator from Maine that it is not necessary to give an opinion of our own first; and in that respect the report of the committee, which I frankly confess I have not read carefully, is right.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now let us vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to a statement I made a moment ago. I quote from the report:

> But, in the judgment of your committee, it would not be wise or expedient for the United States to refuse to pay the award on this ground—

That is, on the ground of only the two concurring—

> if the British government, after the subject shall have been brought to its attention, claim that, in their judgment, the award is made in accordance with the terms of the treaty and in conformity with sound principles of law.

Mr. HILL. Then, I understand, all the committee recommend is that we shall have a conference with the British government on this subject and ascertain whether we do concur upon that question or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is all.

Mr. HILL. Very well. I think that is right.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the recommendation is simply of an inquiry to ascertain whether or not the British government want the money. I do not doubt that they do; nor do I doubt that, without some strong expression on the part of the American Congress or the American Executive that this award is not binding, no government in Great Britain will dare to take the ground that the United States ought not to pay the award. In order to obtain a fair negotiation with Great Britain it is necessary for us to express our opinion, because unless we do no government in Great Britain will dare to propose to give up money which has already been decided to be theirs by a board of arbitration. For that reason I support the motion to refer the question of law to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do not believe in the doctrine that, because we have agreed to submit a question of international difficulty to arbitration, therefore we ought to agree to what the arbitrators say, whether it is right or wrong. I believe in this new plan or practice of settling difficulties, that the true interests of the plan with a view to advance the peace of nations and the good of mankind require that we ought to insist on what is right at the hands of arbitrators as well as at the point of the bayonet.

I shall not inflict further remarks on the Senate at this time. I know everybody wants to adjourn; but, in order to place myself on the record rightly, I offer this substitute for the resolution:

> That the Government of the United States is dissatisfied with the award purporting to have been made by the commission composed of Sir Alexander T. Galt, named by Her Britannic Majesty; Hon. Ensign H. Kellogg, named by the President of the United States; and Mr. Maurice Delfosse, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Belgium to the United States, named by the Austrian embassador at London, in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, and respectfully dissent from and except to the same upon the following specified grounds, namely:
> First. The said award was not duly made by the said commission, the Hon. Ensign H. Kellogg, a member thereof, having failed to join in or sanction the same.
> Second. The sum of money so awarded is grossly exorbitant and greatly beyond any sum contemplated by the government of Great Britian or the United States in submitting the matter in dispute to arbitration.
> The President is requested to bring the grounds of exception above specified to the attention of the government of Great Britain and invoke due consideration of the same.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands this to be a substitute for the report of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order now. The question is on the motion to refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order after the question is taken on the pending motion, which is to refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions.

Mr. MERRIMON. That was voted down. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered. The question now is on the motion to refer with instructions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say a word before that motion is put. This very able and interesting and instructive discussion of this very important measure for four long consecutive hours has developed the very important fact that very few of the Senators have read the report upon this bill and the letter of the Secretary of State. Now, to give an opportunity for Senators to read these, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BECK. I hope there will be an adjournment until Monday morning, but if there is not to be I wish to say a few words about the reference, although I know how unpleasant it is to attempt to speak now and how weary the Senate is of this debate at this late hour.

Mr. EATON. I hope the Senator will go on. There is plenty of time.

Mr. BECK. I succeeded the other day in having a measure postponed by threatening to make a speech, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] suggests now that I can get an adjournment by threatening to speak for an hour.

Several SENATORS. Try it.

Mr. BECK. No, I will not attempt to speak more than five or ten minutes. I will say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that I have read the reports and read them as carefully as I could, and it seems to me that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations decides nothing and recommends nothing. When we vote for it we accomplish nothing and determine no principle. We have to take up the bill which accompanies the report and pass upon it before any final action binding upon anybody is had. That committee has said almost in so many words that they do not believe that the award is a binding one. They use this language:

> In establishing the Halifax commission no such authority was given to a mere majority of the commission, and no provision was inserted to except the proceedings from the law of arbitration that commonly prevails in England and America.

The committee insist that it requires all three of the arbitrators to agree before an award is binding, and the Secretary of State quotes the language of Mr. Blake, the minister of justice of the Dominion of Canada, in which he used these words:

> That the amount of compensation that we would receive from our fisheries must be an amount unanimously agreed upon by the commissioners; and that, therefore, we must be willing to accept such compensation as the American commissioner would be willing to concede to us, or we should receive nothing.

So that we have both sides agreeing in requiring unanimity of action.

The Secretary of State adds:

While the commission was in session, an equally distinct declaration of the British opinion of the requirements of the treaty, on this point, appeared in the columns of the leading newspaper of that country. The London Times announced in its issue of July 6, 1877, in the most unqualified terms, that "on every point that comes before it [the fishery commission], for decision, the unanimous consent of all its members is, by the terms of the treaty, necessary before an authoritative verdict can be given."

That is the language quoted by the Secretary of State, of the minister of justice of the Canadian Dominion, and the emphatic language of the London Times; the common law of the world is stated by our own committee; we have the acknowledged fact that only two of the three arbitrators united, while the third protested against the validity of the action taken at the time and entered his objection upon the record. Yet the Committee on Foreign Relations ask us to indorse their opinion when they tell us in their report that they have no opinion and refuse to give any, and they follow it with a bill which it is not proposed shall be considered by us now, a bill placing $5,500,000 of the money taken from the tax-payers of this country in the hands of the President, using this language:

With which to pay to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the fisheries commission, lately assembled at Halifax, in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, if—if after correspondence with the British government the President shall deem it his duty to make the payment without further communication with Congress.

In other words, after the President has written to Her Majesty Queen Victoria a kind letter, and she has answered him, renewing the assurances of her most distinguished consideration, then he is to pay her the money, if he feels like it, without further communication to Congress, although we may be satisfied that there was no authority for the action taken, no award, nothing to bind us, and no justice in making the payment. That is trifling with the interests and squandering the money of the people. We ought either to order the President to pay the amount awarded or not to pay it, and not leave him to enter into correspondence with Her Majesty and settle the question for himself, agreeing to be satisfied with his action, without requiring him to tell us why; or we must say to him that he shall not pay it until further assurances have been given and better reasons furnished than we have yet had. It was for that reason that I prepared an amendment yesterday, which I had read at the Clerk's desk, and which I shall insist upon, not perhaps in the exact words, but in substance, before this vast amount of money is paid. My amendment provides that the British minister at Washington shall lay before the President such evidence as, in the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, renders it certain that the British ministry and the Crown lawyers decide and insist that the award as made was in strict accordance with law, and would have been regarded by them as binding and conclusive on the British government if the award had been adverse to their claims; and that he shall not direct the payment of any part of the money hereby appropriated until such decision is furnished as aforesaid.

What I mean is that if Congress is going to give the President any instructions at all, let them be instructions that will advise him precisely what Congress requires him to do, and not allow him to have such communications as may suit himself, and then authorize him to pay or not pay according to the diplomatic ideas that he may entertain, and then in all probability abuse him after he has done it for not doing what we afterward think is right. I propose to tell him what to do; to say to him, "If the British government and its legal advisers insist that this is a proper award, and that they would have paid whatever was awarded under it if the decision had been against them, I would advise, so as to hold them bound in all time to come, to pay the money." But if they, after reviewing it, say, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, and he should advise the President that they would not have paid the money if the decision had been against them, because they did not regard it as a valid award, then we ought not to pay it, and they will not expect it of us. I have faith in the integrity and ability of the English lawyers, and I do not believe they would assert a false or unjust demand because they had gained an illegal advantage.

It is trifling, in my judgment, not only with a great question but with the President, and doing him injustice, to throw this responsibility upon him, when the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Secretary of State, when everybody asks Congress to express some opinion upon the subject, and when the Secretary of State said, as was read by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] that in his opinion, after careful examination of the case, he was satisfied that the commissioners had taken into account indefinite and quite illusory elements of calculation wholly outside of the treaty, and upon that had based their award. It is not true, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] supposed, that he gave that opinion without stating any facts; for in the same report he says that a million dollars was all this country was ever willing to give for the use of these fisheries in perpetuity, and he calls attention to the fact that we are required to pay $5,500,000 for the use for twelve years, and that we had refused, even when we offered them a million, to allow them to ship their fish into the markets of the United States free of duty, as we do under the treaty, which he says was worth $275,000 or $300,000 a year, making a privilege of $10,000,000 when what we got is only worth $25,000 a year to us. The Secretary of State goes into an elaborate calculation in the report that I hold in my hand, saying that after five years under operation of this treaty, when we had all the facts before us, it is established that the full value of the fish caught inside of Canadian waters amounted to not more than 167,000 barrels and were only worth $3.75 a barrel, and then, to use his language:

This would give as the value, cured and packed, of the American catch under the privilege of article 18 (upon the Canadian claim of three-quarters being in-shore) $472,353. But in this value are included the barrel, the salt, the expense of catching, curing, and packing, all of which must be deducted before the profit, which measures the value of the fishery privilege, is reached. Upon the evidence a dollar a barrel would be an excessive estimate of such profit. This would give a profit to the United States from the enjoyment, for these five seasons of the fishery privilege conceded under article 18, of but $25,000 a year.

For which a majority of this commission say you shall pay $500,000 a year and remit tariff duties amounting to $300,000 more, on their fish. The Secretary of State is too diplomatic and the Committee on Foreign Relations are too diplomatic to say that they mean to charge that to be a fraud; but they do charge it in the most emphatic and positive way by saying that $500,000 a year is given for this privilege, while $300,000 a year is yielded by us to let the Canadians get their fish to the American market free of duty when everybody else has to pay duty. Here is $800,000 a year we pay for a privilege that on careful and deliberate calculation made by the Secretary is said by him to be worth only $25,000 a year. I want to know what that is except a charge of fraud, growing out of a state of fact showing that we are required to pay $775,000 a year more than the thing is worth, accompanied by the charge that the arbitrators have gone outside of the treaty to do it, and then ask us to be assured that he makes no charge, and further asks us, without expressing any opinion of our own, to say "that is all; this must be assumed to be right, if the President, after correspondence with Her Britannic Majesty, sees fit to pay the sum awarded if he thinks that politeness and diplomacy and the courtesy which prevail among nations, and prevail a good deal more in other high places than they ought to do for the good of the people make him believe that he had better pay it." I beg leave to differ with him.

I want to pay the money if it is right and proper to pay it. If it is not proper to pay I do not intend to pay it if I can help it. I want the Law Committee of this House to re-examine all the facts, and tell us whether it is proper to pay it or not; when the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the other distinguished lawyers who compose the Judiciary Committee look over all these facts and reports, examining what the Secretary of State has said; see what Mr. Minister Blake, of Canada, has said; see what the English press has said, examine the facts as they exist, consider the $300,000 of privilege given in the way of free markets, and the $500,000 a year to be given for a privilege worth only $25,000 a year—if they determine there is nothing wrong, no fraud, nothing but equity and justice in the award rendered, and if the English crown lawyers agree that it is all just, and Her Majesty's ministers say it is all just, then I think I shall vote to pay it; but I desire a report from our Law Committee, and I desire to have the English lawyers committed upon the record. I want the facts to appear and I want these questions met not in a diplomatic way, but in a straightforward, manly way, face to face and man to man, so that all the people can understand it, because every dollar of the money required to be paid has to be taken by taxation from the hats, the boots, the clothes, the whisky, the tobacco, and the necessaries of the laboring poor of this country. We are trustees. We are not paying money of our own.

That is the truth about it, and we may as well look at it. All our subsidies, all our gifts, and all our high-toned speeches mean this: that we will, in order to keep up genteel diplomatic relations, which we regard as being so delicate, so sensitive that we cannot inquire into the facts, impose additional taxes (which have now almost exhausted a poverty-stricken people) to the amount of $5,500,000 to be paid to England for a privilege which in twelve years amounts, as the committee themselves say, to $10,000,000 for what is worth less than three-quarters of a million, and all for the benefit of a few fishermen along the New England coast, while the representatives of these people are raising a clamor every day about the destruction of rights and the raids upon the Treasury made by southern claims. Why, sir, you have had for seven years a southern claims commission, sitting at an expense of over $50,000 a year, and in seven years they have failed to pay over $3,500,000 for southern claims; less than a third of what you are now so anxious to pay in the interest of a few New England fishermen.

I desire that the truth shall appear. If they have got ten million dollars of benefit, say so, and charge it to them; let us have the facts. I do not believe they have got it, and I want the truth and the whole truth to appear by the report of the Judiciary Committee. If this award has been a fraud, or if Mr. Delfosse or anybody else has done wrong, or if we have appointed incompetent men to manage our affairs, let the Judiciary Committee state the truth. I do not say we have done either one or the other of these things, but before I vote I want the Judiciary Committee to tell me what the truth is, and then I will try and vote right.

Mr. EATON. Now let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont as amended, to refer with instructions.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMLIN, (when Mr. CONKLING'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to say that he was called away, and had paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If the Senator from New York were here, he would vote "nay" and the Senator from Wisconsin "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL, (after having voted in the affirmative.) The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] was called away, and I paired with him upon this question. I withdraw my vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is absent at home. I am authorized to pair him on all political questions; but I do not know how he would vote on this.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 29; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to amend the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting the words which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Government of the United States is dissatisfied with the award purporting to have been made by the commission composed of Sir Alexander T. Galt, named by Her Britannic Majesty; Hon. Ensign H. Kellogg, named by the President of the United States; and Mr. Maurice Delfosse, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Belgium to the United States, named by the Austrian ambassador at London, in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, and respectfully dissent from and except to the same upon the following specified grounds, namely:

First. The said award was not duly made by the said commission, Hon. Ensign H. Kellogg, a member thereof, having failed to join in or sanction the same.

Second. The sum of money so awarded is grossly exorbitant and greatly beyond any sum anticipated by the government of Great Britain or the United States in submitting the matter in dispute to arbitration.

The President is requested to bring the grounds of exception above specified to the attention of the government of Great Britain and invoke due consideration of the same.

Mr. HILL. I do not know whether I ought to say, but I will say that I doubt the propriety of that. I must confess that I am of the opinion that if we are to correspond with the British government upon this legal question, we ought to do it without taking a distinct position on the question ourselves. If we are satisfied ourselves, what do we want to correspond with Great Britain about? If Great Britain will agree that an award made by two of three arbitrators—in other words, by a majority of the arbitrators—shall in all cases hereafter be accepted as an award, the rule will work as well for us as for her, and I am inclined to think myself that, as a matter of policy in the intercourse of nations, it is the best rule. It is a shorter settlement of difficulties. If we vote for this proposition we are taking a very distinct position which will embarrass us in the further correspondence on this subject. If we vote down the proposition, it is an admission by us that the award is a good one, that the award must properly be paid. I really suggest to my friend from North Carolina that it is not exactly proper to vote on the question in that form. I think we had better leave this matter open, and open a correspondence with Great Britain on the subject, and if she agrees that a majority of arbitrators appointed as these were, will be competent to make an award, the rule will bind her forever; she never can complain hereafter; and I am not so sure but that it would be the best rule to establish anyway.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think the objection taken to the substitute I have offered is not sound. The proposition of the committee is to the effect that the President shall negotiate with England with a view to have England consent to such views as the President may express on the subject of this award. That is the object. They contemplate a conference with Great Britain on this subject just as much as I do. I am only a little more frank. That is all. I propose that the Congress of the United States shall assume the responsibility that it ought to assume. It is perfectly manifest from this debate that the whole Senate is dissatisfied with this award for various considerations. My amendment says that, and I am free to say that I introduce it, not that I expect it will pass, but for the purpose of placing myself right upon the record. It expresses my opinion, my judgment; but if any one thinks it is going to embarrass the Government or anybody, I will not object to withdrawing it, because I see it will not prevail. My object is simply to place myself right on the record. I am opposed to paying a dollar until this matter shall be examined as such matters ought to be examined between two nations. I believe this is the way to bring the subject to the attention of Great Britain. This is the way to make up the pleadings. We suggest our dissent and express our grounds of dissent, and we ask her to consider them and then we will negotiate upon them. It is the only way it can ever be settled properly.

But, as I said, I am content that the majority of the Senate shall have their own way. Therefore, at the suggestion of various Senators, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I want to vote against the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end as an addition:

That in the judgment of the two Houses the provisions of articles 18 and 21—

Which are the article that authorizes us to fish and the article which authorizes the Canadians to bring in fresh fish free of duty—of the treaty between the United States and the government of Great Britain concluded on the 8th day of May, 1871, ought to be terminated at the earliest period consistent with the provisions of article 33 of the same treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EATON. I hope the Senate will not agree to it. It is virtually the same thing that was offered by the Senator yesterday in different language; the same principle is involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Virtually, according to the criticism made yesterday, it is not the same thing.

Mr. EATON. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly. Now, Mr. President, I will state that the two articles there referred to are these: the first one gives us this right of inshore fishery, upon which this award was made; the second, the correlative one, gives the subjects of Her Majesty the right to bring their fish into the United States free of duty. The thirty-third article of the treaty provides that at the expiration of ten years, which term has now more than half run, either government may give notice to the other of the wish to terminate these provisions, and, if terminated, of course that is the end of them. Now if the ten years go by without having the President of the United States authorized to terminate this treaty, he has no authority of his own to do it, and we become liable upon the same principles that we are now proceeding upon to pay for the next ten years, or, at the very least, the next two years. That is a question I will not undertake to discuss at this time of day.

This, therefore, is merely stating, as the original resolution does, the judgment of the Senate, its opinion as to the fitness of continuing this treaty; and the difference between this proposition and the one of yesterday I will say to my friend from Connecticut, is that yesterday the proposition that I offered made the propriety of terminating these provisions of the treaty literally contingent on Great Britain receiving this money, and it was said that is a menace, it is a kind of a threat, it is a kind of persuasion, at the very least, to induce Her Majesty's government not to take this money and to try it again. Now, to obviate that, I wish to express my judgment, if I vote alone, in favor of that proposition, as we are expressing the opinions of this body, and if the House concurs of that body, simply that no matter what sum might be awarded, we ought not to continue the arrangement in our judgment beyond the time that we are bound to continue it.

The treaty is peculiarly framed about that. If you have a new abitration for the next ten years, there can be no balance allowed in our favor. The treaty only provides for paying money to Her Majesty's government no matter how clear it might appear that under those two articles of the treaty the advantage in favor of the subjects of Great Britain was $10,000,000 for the ten years or twenty, nothing can be paid to us.

It is manifest on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and was known before to people who were acquainted with the state of these fisheries, that the value that we obtain in the privilege of fishing within three miles bears no comparison to the value that the British subjects obtain in respect of importing their fish free of duty into the United States, giving to Her Majesty's subjects a favor in respect of importations that is accorded to no other nation; and it is open to great question in my mind whether under some of the treaties with other powers we should not be bound to admit the silks of France, &c., free of duty upon the theory that we were granting special privileges and favors to one nation that we do not give to others.

What I wish is to express my opinion now, as we are upon opinions and nothing else, that at the earliest moment we can consistently with the provisions of this treaty we ought to terminate it, and let the American fishermen within the three miles fish under such arrangements as they can make with the authorities, or not fish at all, and let the British fishermen when they import their fish into the United States pay the duties that the laws of Congress provide for goods of that character. That is the proposition. I wish to vote upon it for one as an opinion, as we are upon opinions.

Mr. HILL. I do not know that I would disagree much with the Senator from Vermont as to the propriety of giving this notice under proper circumstances; but I submit to the Senate whether it is proper to attach the notice to our action upon this award at all. It is altogether a different subject-matter. It seems to me that it had better be brought up as an independent matter and let it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and go through the regular course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is it a different subject-matter, Mr. President? The Committee on Foreign Relations have demonstrated to us, if we put faith in their report, that, taking these two articles together, there being a balance of benefits in our favor, yet the balance is largely the other way according to this so-called award.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, with a view to the termination of this question, the Senate is called upon to express an opinion about one of the hands of this affair. I propose to take what belongs to it and to express the opinion at the same time that under any circumstances, not as a menace or a persuasion or anything else, but on this report, under any circumstances, it is our opinion that the arrangement ought not to be continued beyond the term already agreed upon.

Mr. HILL. The subject about which we desire to correspond with Great Britain now is not in relation to the fisheries. It is in relation to the legality of an award, which would be the same question whether it was about fisheries or anything else. The question we are to correspond immediately with Great Britain about is whether a majority of arbitrators appointed as these were can make a legal award. That is the question now up; that is the question about which we wish to correspond. It is true the award as made grows out of the fisheries; but this other question as to whether we shall terminate the treaty of Washington is another question, I respectfully think, although both grow out of the same subject. I think it is a different matter.

Mr. EATON. By that treaty we have four years yet to determine that matter in.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Vermont in his amendment yesterday, in the general judgment of the Senate and finally his own, had got upon a ground which was objectionable, for it looked like expressing to Great Britain something of a menace——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not finally in my own, I beg to say.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought so because the Senator modified it. This is a declaration of our own judgment. You may go around the Senate here and ask every individual Senator on both sides of the Chamber whether in his judgment the treaty ought to be terminated at the proper time. Now, if we all think so, why in the world shall we not say so in our own legislative capacity, not in any relation to Great Britain, not for communication through the diplomatic channels? What in the world is the harm of saying so? Why can we not simply say so? If we vote down the amendment we say the other thing. It is here, and I judge the Senator from Vermont will keep it here. I know he is the most yielding and amiable of men; yet occasionally he will hold on to a point when he asserts it. Now I submit to the Senate that as we all believe that proposition, it is a great deal straighter, franker, and a more direct way simply to vote it and put it upon our record.

Mr. HILL. My point is that there are a great many things we might all wish to say, there are a great many things on which we all might agree, but that is no reason we should attach them to this resolution; that is no reason we should complicate this question with those matters. We have a simple question before us whether a certain award which has been made is a legal award; and the point why it is not a legal award is that it was made by two only, a majority of the arbitrators. We want to correspond with Great Britain as to whether she will insist that it is a legal award or not. I do not care whether it is about fisheries or anything that is a different subject-matter altogether; I think it is a very important matter. I do think it is a very important thing to get Great Britain committed to the proposition that a majority of arbitrators may make an award, and in my judgment the question of the fisheries is a very small matter in comparison with that.

Now what the Senator from Vermont brings forward by his amendment as to giving this notice, is a different matter, not at all depending upon this. It is a matter which we can attend to to-morrow just as well as to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. It is a matter which we can do at the next session as well as at this; and why therefore attach it to this?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. In one moment. It may be regarded by Great Britain too that we are giving this notice in a little spirit of spite, that we are dissatisfied with this award.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are we not dissatisfied with it?

Mr. HILL. Well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we are not, we are making a great fuss about nothing.

Mr. HILL. We think it is a very heavy award; that is true; but still that is not the question here. The simple question is this: whether you are dissatisfied or not, if it is an award you ought to pay it. It does not become a dependent to complain of the justice of a judgment after he has agreed to the tribunal to decide it and that tribunal has entered judgment; and it is not very well for us to be expressing dissatisfaction with the judgment after it is rendered. The great question and the only question is to ascertain has a judgment been rendered, has a legal award been made?

Mr. EDMUNDS. How are you going to ascertain that?

Mr. HILL. We are going to ascertain that by correspondence with Great Britain. If she insists that an award has been made——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is an award.

Mr. HILL. No, I do not say that, but I say if Great Britain insists that there is an award, I will then agree to pay the award because both the contracting parties are committed to the principle that a majority of the arbitrators can make an award. We have then the principle established; that is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How are both committed?

Mr. HILL. If we pay the award knowing that it is an award by a majority of the arbitrators, and Great Britain insists that it is an award when made by a majority, both are committed to the principle that a majority of arbitrators may make an award.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But this resolution does not propose to pay it.

Mr. HILL. Which resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution we are asked to vote on is not a resolution to pay the award.

Mr. HILL. This resolution does look to the payment of the award if after correspondence with Great Britain she shall insist that it is a legal award. It certainly appropriates the money and looks to payment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I now ask the Senator the question I wished to put a little while ago?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Georgia says that the aim of this resolution is to fish an opinion out of Great Britain on that question. Suppose the government of Great Britain should say to us "inasmuch as you have no opinions to express, your Congress has refused to express any opinion on this subject, we beg to be excused from expressing any opinion; the time for the payment of the award has not yet come; if you think you are bound to pay it upon just principles of international comity, pay it; if you do not think so, then do not pay it, and we will see afterward what happens as a consequence;" what are we to say then? Are we not in rather an extraordinary attitude to go fishing for an opinion of our adversary before we are willing to express any of our own, when we are dissatisfied?

Mr. HILL. I do not understand that we are going fishing for an opinion from an adversary, nor do I consider that the position will be at all embarrassing to us.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to say that I do not understand that this resolution which the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes prevents the President of the United States from intimating an opinion of his own to the British government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But what is the opinion of the President of the United States? The Constitution of the United States does not authorize the President of the United States to have an opinion that binds the United States. When the President of the United States finds that Congress has refused to express any opinion, he ought to take the same attitude.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that in the matter of diplomatic correspondence—of course it does not bind the United States in the sense that a treaty binds the United States—but I never heard that in a diplomatic correspondence with foreign governments the diplomatic agents ought not to express opinions as to questions of law or questions of fact when the interests of their governments require, and I do not understand that this resolution interferes with that power or duty.

Mr. HILL. If the President should express an opinion by authority of Congress then it would be a proper opinion to express; but I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I think, so far from being in an awkward position by not expressing our opinion now as to whether this is an award in law or not, we are in a better position not to express an opinion. We express our doubts about it; we are not willing to determine the question for ourselves absolutely whether it is an award or not; but here it is, a question upon which two must agree. If we say to-day that in our judgment this is not a regular award, that is an end of the matter. What do you want correspondence with Great Britain about it for then? The only question of correspondence with Great Britain then will be to get up another arbitration if she agrees with you; and if she does not agree with you then to get up an arbitration on the question of law. But if we say it is not an award, Great Britain will feel then "why do you ask me whether I will accept it; if you say it is a legal award, why do you not pay it? That is the end of the matter. Why do you not pay it if it is a legal award?" But we have doubts about it and we simply want to enter into a correspondence with our adversary to get a concurrence of opinion.

But I did not intend to say anything except that I think under all the circumstances, without reference to the merits of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and while upon the merit of the resolution I might agree with him as an independent resolution, and I think I would, yet, as there is ample time to give the notice, for I believe we have yet four years to run, and as there is no necessity for giving it now, and to connect it with this matter may somewhat complicate it, I prefer that we should not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstands the scope of the amendment. The amendment is not a notice. It only expresses the present opinion of the Senate that under whatever circumstances, according to the light we now have, these two articles ought not to be continued beyond the time we have agreed they shall be continued.

Mr. HILL. If it is not to be a notice it is to have no effect, and it is a mere expression of opinion which amounts to nothing, and why express it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has the same effect as every resolution, and a little more.

Mr. HILL. I think we should say nothing about it. We have one subject, which is whether we shall pay this award. Let us settle that.

Mr. THURMAN. I have only one word to say. I very much wish that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont were a substitute for the resolution. We are asked to pass this resolution, so as to let Great Britain know, and let everybody else know, that this award cannot be the measure of damages in the future in case the treaty be extended for another term. Now, if we say we do not intend to extend the treaty for another term at all, we have in the most positive way in the world said that we will not have this as a measure of damages, for we do not intend to extend the treaty; it is our opinion that the treaty ought not to be extended at all; and therefore there is no danger of there being any such thing thrown up into our faces as this award as a measure of damages. I would prefer the amendment if it were offered as a substitute for the resolution, but if it is not I can vote for it as the most effective way of declaring that we do not recognize this as a measure of damages, for we do not intend to extend the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I shall not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont; and when a Senator upon this floor takes a bold stand of that sort, I think he ought to explain himself. I have listened to this debate as attentively, I may venture to say, as any Senator upon this floor, and have given more attention to it than to most of the questions that are brought before this body for decision. I believe it is an irritating question. It has very remote and dangerous consequences. In its effect one way or the other it touches the relations of the Dominion of Canada to the United States, and I think it not unlikely that what we shall determine and decide upon this question will have very much to do in the future with the relations of the United States with that dominion.

I voted to remit this question to the Judiciary Committee, and supposed that I was voting intelligently. I wished the Judiciary Committee to consider this subject. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations advised this body that he did not wish to have this question sent back to that committee in one of the best speeches that I have heard the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] make this session. I wanted the question referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in the hope that that committee would seriously take hold of this question and report to this body whether the award made, about which we are debating now, was an award within the boundary of the submission and jurisdiction of law. If that committee should find that it was not such an award, and not so sustained, then we should, as a Congress, so frankly advise the British government. There is a frank way of dealing with a nation as with a man.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] an hour ago submitted a remark which seems to have escaped attention; that the British government will be embarrassed with any correspondence that may hereafter arise between the executive department of this Government and that, because of the award already made, and the British government will be in poor condition to have a correspondence with this with the eyes of the British nation fixed upon the British government, with an award against the United States of $5,500,000 in gold. How is the government of Great Britain to answer the President of the United States or the Secretary of State? How are they to negotiate about this question with the award rendered and with the appropriation made by this Congress to pay it? I wish to know what the Executive has to stand on, what ground has the Secretary of State to stand on in opening a new correspondence on this question with the British government? Here is the award already rendered; the bill has passed the Congress appropriating the money from the Treasury. I wish to know how the British government is to answer to us so as to avoid an award in its own favor. I wish, therefore, that the Judiciary Committee had taken this question and reported back that the award was not sustained by law; that, as it was a decision in which the three commissioners did not agree, and therefore not an award, this Government would not subscribe to nor sustain it.

It is said the reason we take that position is because the award is against us. The award, if it be one, is truly against this Government, and the trouble about the question is the mischief to grow out of it; it affects our relations not so much with the British Empire as with the Dominion of Canada. The trouble about this award is that every man, woman, and child in the United States believes now, and will ever believe, that it was outrageous, that it is based on injustice, and some people will be so extravagant as to say that it was founded on fraud.

Our relations with these people on the north are very delicate, and I wish to cultivate the most amiable and cordial and tender understanding with them. I have even entertained the hope, Mr. President, that the time might come when the people of Canada would see that their true welfare consisted in a union with the United States. But the results that come from an arbitration of this sort are well calculated to sow the seeds of discord that will grow into a rivalry of hate, so that instead of the Dominion of Canada coming as it ought naturally to come into the United States as a part of the Union, it will ultimately have to come if at all by force, for this Government has not yet given up the idea of "54° 40′ or fight." There is not an inch of territory on this continent north of the forty-ninth parallel that ought not to be under the jurisdiction of the American people this very hour.

These questions, Mr. President, will take hold of the American people, and this award is a rich provocation. The American people love justice, and they love right. The English nation have ever, if I may go so far as to say, boasted, they have certainly ever claimed that they have been the great lovers of right and of the fair thing. The British people and the British government know to-day that the award of the fishery commission is a fraud and an outrage, and it is the duty of this American people to say so frankly, as I hoped if this subject had gone to the Judiciary Committee they would have reported that it was in violation of law, and that we should have said through the Secretary of State to the British government that we hold this award to be in violation of law. That is the ground for the American people to stand on; that is the ground for honest and frank people to occupy.

Sir, if you pass this resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the bill is a foregone conclusion, the appropriation is a foregone conclusion. Will this Senate sit here and pass this resolution, indorsing the report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, and let our vote go out to the world and especially to the British people, let them take possession of our proceedings to-day, and then not pass the bill? Of course the bill will pass, or we shall present a beautiful spectacle to the world; and when the resolution shall pass, and the bill shall have become a law, we shall have given up the whole question.

The treaty of Washington, as we all believed, was a most honorable and excellent substitute for war, or for the difficulties then existing between the British nation and the American Republic. We all fell in with it; we all talked about it, and believed that we had at last cut the Gordian knot which had been the source of trouble and of suspicion and of discord between these great peoples. The Geneva award was made, out of which we received less than we ought to have received. Of course the British people were satisfied with it. I doubt not that ninety-nine one-hundredths of the English people were satisfied with it, for it was a victory over us. Fifteen millions five hundred thousand dollars paid in gold to this Republic for depredations and outrages upon our people which exceeded in amount one thousand millions in gold! The outrages perpetrated by the British people upon this Republic during the late war between us and the South settled by the small sum of fifteen and a half millions of dollars in gold! They prolonged the war a year beyond its necessary duration, and deceived the South all the way through. They misled and deceived the South, held out the hope to them that they would recognize their independence at some day in the near future; that the British government stood ready to recognize the confederacy. They deceived the South, and they pilfered and preyed upon the North. A thousand million dollars would not have paid the damages they inflicted on this country. And yet grave Senators rise here and say that $15,500,000 was more than we were entitled to. It was a pitiful sum, and it does not concern the British government as to what we shall do with it, and I do not propose to consult them as to how we shall dispose of it. I believe they have more intelligence than to expect it from us.

Following in the tread of that great Geneva award they have already received $2,000,000 in gold; this fisheries commission gives back $5,500,000 more in gold, the award and finding of the commission inflicted upon us as smart money, as vindictive damages. The award is rendered in the sense of inflicting a punishment upon us. Every intelligent and reflecting Senator knows that what we gave the Dominion of Canada under that treaty was fully equal to all we received from it; and because there was a demand upon the part of the people of Canada that the considerations passing between the two governments were not quite equal, the treaty of Washington provided for the substitution of this commission to come in and settle whatever partial differences there were growing out of what the Dominion of Canada believed to be of advantage on their part. This commission met. The American people paid no attention to it. Beyond the President and beyond the State Department, no attention was paid to the deliberation of the commission because no intelligent Englishman and no intelligent American believed that the award when made would startle the sense of justice of the world as it did. It was an outrage, and it deserves to be characterized upon the floor of the United States Senate as an outrage; and if the Judiciary Committee had taken charge of this question and reported back to this body that the award was in violation of law, I would have voted to so state, and I would have voted against the appropriation.

Now, since the Senate has declined to do that, there is no other course left, as the majority seems to have that view, but to vote for the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to vote to remit this question back to the Secretary of State and the President, and to ask the President of this nation—look at it, Senators—to ask our President to open a begging and apologetic correspondence with the British government to see if they will be kind enough to remit a few of the dollars awarded to them. My God! I would rather pay millions than take any such attitude as that.

The way to do is for the Congress of the United States to meet the question like men, and to say to the British government, "This award is unjust, and we are not disposed to stand by it."

When you pass this resolution, when you pass upon the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, your bill must necessarily follow. To be consistent with ourselves it must follow, or we shall present a beautiful spectacle to the world as a great, intelligent, and deliberate treaty-making power and body! No, Senators, we must be consistent with our own conduct; we must keep in the line of consistency with ourselves, and it would be far better for the British people, for the Dominion of Canada, and for the United States to have sent this to the Judiciary Committee, to have had that committee report back upon the law of this case, and then to have boldly said that it is such an outrage that we choose to stand upon the law of the case, not as the Senator from Ohio said upon the technicalities of the case—no, Mr. President, upon the law of the case. That is what we ought to have stood upon.

Why, this thing, the whole matter of our treaty with the British people, the whole matter of this arrangement in 1871 between England and the United States, in its consequences and in its effects, is frittered away and belittled by the finding of this fisheries commission. Do you expect, Mr. President, does any Senator on this floor expect, ever to be able to explain to the American people that that award was just? Will not every Senator leave this floor under the conviction that it is his duty to tell his people that the award is an unjust, a foul award? Then our people expect of us that we will meet it as Senators should meet it, and not go back carping before the people that it was a miserable award and that we met it in a miserable way. No, no; we should deal with the British Empire as they deal with Russia; deal with them as they deal with the rest of the world; deal with them as their equals in power and in moral excellence; tell them that we will submit to no such trickery and chicanery as resulted in this fishery commission under this treaty. I say that the matter of arbitration is belittled by the whole proceeding, and there is not a voter in the United States to-day that will not for the whole future be disgusted with the whole matter of arbitration, if it is to become a system of trickery and contrivance and arrangement by which one power is to gain an advantage and finally an ascendency over another power. Far better have the old methods of battle. Fisticuffs is far more honorable. I say to Senators on this floor we can never make the American people believe that this was anything else than an outrage, and we ought to meet the sense of public justice that is seated deep in the American heart. That is what we ought to do.

I say, again, Mr. President—for I have talked far beyond what I supposed I would when I arose—that our relations with these people on the north are very delicate; and by the rights of human liberty, by the rights of equal justice, by the rights of fair government, and by the higher rights of universal civilization, the Dominion of Canada belongs within the protection and under the cover of the American flag; and the operation of performances of this kind is to separate and divide us and plant the seeds of animosity that will grow into intense and lasting bitterness, and ought not to be endured. That is my opinion about it, and there I leave the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 25.

Several SENATORS. No quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senate can refuse to adjourn without a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us have another division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to amend the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 24.

Mr. OGLESBY. I call for the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"] I wish to say this: if I have a right to call for the yeas and nays before the Chair announces the result of the division—perhaps I have not——

Several SENATORS. You have.

Mr. OGLESBY. Then I call for them. I did not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. Now, why did I not vote for it? The Senator proposes to virtually give notice, with the payment of this money, with the referring of this question to the executive department of the Government, to take it up and open it again; the Senator's amendment proposes to suggest to the British government that we now give notice that the treaty shall end. I propose what I believe to be a wiser course, that if we shall pay the money and shall sanction that award, to avail myself of the advantages of giving that notice at the last possible moment, not now. I propose to take all the opportunities of warning the British people that we will not stand longer under that treaty, and I would rather not give the notice now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will allow me to suggest to him, that this does not give any notice; it merely expresses our opinion under the present light that we have. It is no notice at all.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is not what we ought to do, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me to differ from him, which I do with great reluctance and great respect always. We ought not to do that now; let us hold all the advantages we have left to the last moment, for trouble is to grow out of this matter, great and lasting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. I am in favor of terminating these clauses of the treaty as the amendment of the Senator from Vermont indicates; but I shall vote against the amendment because I do not believe this is the proper time or the proper occasion, nor are the circumstances proper for us to give that notice. I shall vote against the amendment for that reason; but if the Senator from Vermont will introduce such a resolution to-morrow as a separate and independent proposition, I will vote for it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] I should vote "nay" if he were present, and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. My colleague [Mr. MERRIMON] is paired on this question with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BARNUM.] If present, my colleague would vote "yea" and the Senator from Connecticut would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Anthony,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Beck,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Spencer,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn. To-morrow I shall move to take up the other bill of which I have before given notice.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the post-road bill be taken up, to be left as the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot have it taken up to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn; previous to which, if there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 2153) providing for the payment of counsel fees in Osage ceded land suits was read the first time by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Indian Affairs have reported that identical bill and it is now on the Calendar. I ask that the House bill be read the second time and placed on the Calendar without a reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is a proposition to advance it without a reference I object to the second reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn. You cannot put the question of the second reading on the same day.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and at (six o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 1, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative appropriation bill (H. R. No. 4104) just returned from the Senate, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it be printed with the Senate amendments.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. No. 3988) to organize the life-saving service.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from Wednesday, being the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] in relation to the internal revenue.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to take up the life-saving-service bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The gentleman, however, may raise the question of consideration as to the unfinished business.

Mr. BURCHARD. The House was dividing when the adjournment took place.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York to forego the regular order until we can have the morning hour.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope that will be done.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection, if the committees desire to report, to there being a morning hour. A morning hour may intervene by unanimous consent, and the unfinished business can then be resumed.

Mr. REAGAN. After the morning hour I shall insist on taking up the bill for the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. BUCKNER. If consent is given for a morning hour, I presume that will not prevent the question of consideration on the unfinished business or any other measure after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The House has control over its own business by a majority. It is proposed that the consideration of the unfinished business be delayed, that there may be a morning hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The morning hour begins at twenty-six minutes past eleven o'clock.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have a proposition to make, if gentlemen will hear me.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has begun. The gentleman can make his proposition after the morning hour.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would prefer to make it now, that an understanding may be come to at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman, and the time will not be taken from the morning hour.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the House with the bill to organize the life-saving service. I propose that it shall be taken up to-night and discussed, so far as deemed necessary, and that the previous question shall be called on Monday at any hour that may be agreed upon.

Mr. O'NEILL. The session of this evening to be for the consideration of that bill exclusively?

Mr. COX, of New York. I will state briefly the reason for this proposition, and I think it must approve itself to every gentleman. This life-saving service is in certain respects inefficient. We had a storm only the night before last in which a vessel went ashore on the Jersey coast, and no provision is now made for such storms at this time of the year.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to make a suggestion. I think there will be no objection to an evening session for the discussion of the bill which the gentleman from New York desires to bring up if it be confined to that business only; and I would suggest that an hour be fixed on Tuesday on which the vote shall be taken. Instead of having the previous question ordered let an hour be fixed for taking the vote.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will accept the gentleman's suggestion if the House will agree to have an evening session, say on Monday night for the consideration of this bill. The vote can be taken on Tuesday at an hour to be set by the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the previous question is ordered it can be reconsidered and then the matter might be brought up after the morning hour to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. COX, of New York. My object is to have this bill forwarded so that it may get to the Senate in time to be passed before the adjournment and that it may be law before the September gales come on.

Mr. BURCHARD. The House has voted to take up the regular order. Let us dispose of that and get it out of the way.

Mr. COX, of New York. The House has not voted to take up the gentleman's bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. It did the other day.

Mr. HAYES. I demand the regular order. I do not think we are making any headway in this discussion.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the proposition to have an evening session to-night for the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from New York will be agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am willing to have it fixed for Monday night, and to take the vote on Tuesday.

Mr. WOOD. I object to any special order or to any evening sessions being fixed except to proceed to the regular business before the House.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the morning hour begins at eleven o'clock and thirty minutes. Reports from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are still in order.

There were no further reports from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SUPERVISORY JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 179) to give circuit courts supervisory jurisdiction in certain criminal cases. This is the unanimous report of the committee, and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill (H. R. No. 5065) was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that the circuit court shall have jurisdiction on writs of error in all criminal cases tried before the district court where the penalty is confinement in the penitentiary or in the jail, or where, if by fine only, the fine may exceed under the law the sum of $500; and in such cases a person feeling himself aggrieved by a decision of a district court may except to the opinion of the court and tender his bill of exceptions, which, if the truth of the case be fairly stated therein, the judge shall sign, and it shall be a part of the record of the case.

The second section provides that the petition for a writ of error from the judgment of a district court, in the cases referred to in the next preceding section, may be presented to the judge of the circuit court in term or vacation, and if allowed shall be docketed in the circuit court having jurisdiction over any such district; but if refused may be presented to the justice of the Supreme Court who is allotted to such circuit, and if allowed shall be docketed and heard in such circuit court; and the judgment or decision upon such writ of error shall be remitted to the district court appealed from, to be enforced according to law.

The third section provides that a writ of error awarded under this act to any judgment shall act as a supersedeas thereto on such terms and conditions as said court or judge awarding the same may prescribe.

Mr. HANNA. Under the provisions of this bill, unless the law required that the indictment should be returned to the district court this bill would be wholly inoperative. In my district, as a rule, all indictments are now returned into the circuit courts; formerly the practice was to return them to the district courts, but now a rule of practice has obtained by which they are all returned into the circuit courts.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If they are all returned into the circuit courts, then the circuit court obtains jurisdiction. I think this bill will provide all that the gentleman desires. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HARPER'S FERRY, VIRGINIA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3241, a bill (H. R. No. 5066) authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, to cancel certain contracts for the sale of lots of land made at Harper's Ferry in the year 1869 by the United States, to resell the same, and sell or lease all other real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The first section of the bill authorizes the Solicitor of the Treasury, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, to cancel contracts with and release each and all purchasers of lots of land from their purchases made on the 30th of November, 1869, at and near Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, whenever such purchasers shall quitclaim and release said lots or parcels of land to the Government of the United States by deed in such form as may be required by the Solicitor of the Treasury. Provided that such quitclaim and release shall be executed and tendered to the Secretary of War within four months from the passage of this act.

The second section provides that whenever any of said lots and parcels of land shall be quitclaimed and released in pursuance of section 1 of this act, the Solicitor of the Treasury shall, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, cancel the obligation of the purchaser or purchasers thereof, and release the same from all liability to the Government of the United States for the purchase money of such lot or lots of land. And the Solicitor of the Treasury shall, when he deems it expedient to subserve the interests of the Government, have the power, and is hereby authorized to offer for sale said lots or parcels of land so quitclaimed and released by auction, after first giving notice of the time, terms, and place of sale in pursuance of existing law, upon such terms as in his judgment he may deem expedient.

The third section authorizes the Solicitor of the Treasury to make sale, in pursuance of law, of the whole or any part of said property, or, if he deem it expedient and better for the public welfare, lease for any term of years any part or all other real estate and riparian rights now owned by the Government of the United States at or near Harper's Ferry, Jefferson County, West Virginia.

The fourth section authorizes the Solicitor of the Treasury to abate part of the purchase-money due from purchasers who have made improvements upon lots of land purchased as aforesaid at Harper's Ferry, provided that in his judgment such purchasers are legally or equitably entitled to such abatement; and provided further that such purchasers shall make application to the Solicitor for abatement within two months from the passage of this act; and, in case an abatement is made, shall pay the balance of the purchase money due for deducting the amount abated within sixty days thereafter; otherwise the debt to remain as if no abatement had been made.

The fifth section provides that this act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT COURT AT DANVILLE, VIRGINIA.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably House bill No. 3892, to change the time of holding terms of the district court for the western district of Virginia at Danville.

The bill provides that the regular terms of the district court in the western district of Virginia, at Danville, shall be held on the Tuesday after the fourth Monday in February, and on the 15th day of November; but if said last-mentioned day shall fall on Sunday, the term shall commence on the following day; and repeals so much of section 572 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this act.

Mr. KNOTT. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions and to prescribe the times and places for holding the courts therein, and for other purposes, as a substitute for House bill No. 563, to provide for holding the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at the city of Kansas, Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him how often are the terms of the courts to be held at the city of Kansas.

Mr. KNOTT. Twice a year; once in the spring and once in the fall. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2425, to divide the State of Colorado into three judicial districts, a bill (H. R. No. 5068) to amend an act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado."

Mr. CULBERSON. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATURE OF ARIZONA.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 793) to confirm certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, and to provide for the apportionment of the members of the next Legislative Assembly thereof; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to offer an additional amendment to that bill, and ask that it be printed with other amendments.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1582) to create the northern judicial district of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the times and places for holding the courts in said district.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF THE CIRCUIT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bills numbered 1837, 1380, 505, 1399, 1134, 1132, and 2375, a bill (H. R. No. 5069) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of cases from the State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CULBERSON. As this is a very important bill I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill entitled "An act to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act entitled 'An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of cases from the State courts and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1875," reported by the Committee on the Judiciary as a substitute for sundry bills relating to the same subject, be made a special order for the first Wednesday in June next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of; not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills or special orders already made.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman should say "June instant," for we are in June now.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will then modify the resolution so as to say "on Wednesday, June 5."

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the bill be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1858, a bill (H. R. No. 5070) to detach certain territory from the eastern judicial district of Michigan, and to attach the same to the western district of Michigan, and to provide for divisions in said western district, and for holding the district and circuit courts therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. CONGER called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURT AT MARTINSBURGH, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CONGER also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2873, a bill (H. R. No. 5071) to authorize the holding of terms of the United States district court for the district of West Virginia at Martinsburgh; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that terms of the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, in addition to those now prescribed by law, shall be held at Martinsburgh on the 1st day of June and on the 1st day of December in each year; provided that when either of said days shall fall on Sunday the term shall commence the day following; and provided further that the terms of court hereby authorized to be held at Martinsburgh shall be held on condition that all the buildings and necessary conveniences to the holding of court shall be furnished by the county of Berkeley free of all cost and expense to the United States.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. CONGER called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Mr. KNOTT also, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award be made a special order for the first Wednesday in the next session of the present Congress, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until completed, not to conflict with previous special orders, if any.

Mr. KNOTT. There is a written report accompanying this bill, which I ask may be printed; and request also that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] representing the minority of the Committee may have leave to present their views.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask that the bill accompanying the minority report be printed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be printed as a part of the report; it cannot be printed as a bill reported from the committee.

Mr. LAPHAM. The understanding in the committee was that the minority should have leave to report a bill as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The bill can be printed as a part of the minority report; and when the bill of the majority comes up this proposed substitute can be offered as an amendment. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. LAPHAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to insert in the resolution "and the substitute reported by the minority as an amendment."

Mr. KNOTT. I think that would be supererogatory. I have already asked that the minority have leave to present their views.

The SPEAKER. There will be no difficulty about the matter. If the House should not prefer the bill of the majority of the committee, it would vote down the demand for the previous question, and thereupon the amendment proposed by the minority would be in order.

Mr. FRYE. If the previous question is not demanded by the gentleman from Kentucky when the bill comes up, it will be open to amendment, so that the substitute of the minority will be in order, and also an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should not be demanded, or if the call for it should not be sustained, the bill will be subject under the rules to such amendments as may be offered. If there be no objection this resolution will be adopted, and the majority and minority reports will be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM T. DUVAL.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds yesterday reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1138) for the relief of William T. Duval; which was laid on the table; and the report of the majority was ordered to be printed, together with the views of the minority accompanied by the draft of a bill designed as a substitute, the claim being for work done on the Treasury extension. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with the accompanying reports, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

OLIVER WHITSELL.

Mr. WRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5072) for the relief of Oliver Whitsell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. C. M. PRITCHARD.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5073) granting compensation to Mrs. C. M. Pritchard for the use, occupancy, and damage to her property by the United States military authorities during the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TOPOLOVAMPO ROUTE.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent, to offer the following resolution, and ask for its adoption at this time:

Resolved, That when the sundry civil bill comes before the House it shall be in order to amend it by a bill authorizing, under the direction of the Secretary of War, a survey and report of a postal and commercial route from the westernmost terminus of railroad, in Texas, to Topolovampo Bay, (latitude 25° 32' N.,) on the Gulf of California.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is a motion to suspend the rules, and is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is a suspension of the rules, and requires unanimous consent.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Was my resolution objected to?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky to object.

Mr. CARLISLE. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CARLISLE. I object to a suspension of the rules at this time.

CREEK ORPHANS.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5074) to pay to the Creek orphans the amount due and unpaid to them under the stipulation of the treaty of March 24, 1832; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has been given with the understanding suggested by the gentleman from Illinois that the bill is not to be brought back under a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BASIN FOR IRON-CLADS, NORFOLK.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5075) to provide for the construction of a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels in the vicinity of the navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

NANCY A. HERRICK.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the House take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 1896) for the relief of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York, returned from the Senate with an amendment merely adding a preamble and not changing the bill in any form, for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Insert the following preamble:

Whereas Nancy A. Herrick, under and in virtue of the homestead laws, is entitled to the patent for the land hereinafter described; and

Whereas under the circumstances of the case the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, in 1874, that she was not so entitled, was and is erroneous: Therefore, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the unfinished business coming over from Thursday last, a bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. ROBERTS. Is that the regular order of business this morning?

The SPEAKER. It is, undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBERTS. Some days since, in my absence, but perhaps I am misinformed in regard to it, I understood the order of the House was that the consideration of the life-saving service bill should be first considered, and I supposed it was the regular order now.

The SPEAKER. It is not the regular order, nor is it the next in order after the internal-revenue bill, which the gentleman from Illinois is now calling up. That bill is the unfinished business, and next to that for consideration is the interstate-commerce bill reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. ROBERTS. Is it in order for me to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it competent for me, Mr. Speaker, to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I submit that motion and ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement, not to occupy more than two minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Maryland is on the floor raising the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has taken notice of that; but the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to make a statement not to extend over two minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. And not to interfere with the question of consideration raised by the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration cannot be interfered with.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman from Tennessee has made a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which is a privileged motion.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to make this statement: my purpose in moving to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is to reach one or two bills on the public Calendar. One is a bill which ought to be disposed of one way or the other. I will not undertake to say how gentlemen should vote on it, but I ask as a matter of courtesy it be disposed of one way or the other, in order that an important work should go on. It is Senate bill No. 608, in reference to the Memphis post-office. I ask the House to go into committee to consider that bill, and then to consider——

Mr. BURCHARD. When the gentleman gets the House into committee he will have to lay aside all prior bills.

Mr. YOUNG. That is what I propose to do.

Mr. BURCHARD. And he could be antagonized with other business, as was done the other day.

Mr. YOUNG. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] is in order. But the Chair understands that the gentleman wants to make a condition with the House that after the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole all other bills shall be laid aside until the bill in relation to the custom-house at Memphis and another bill indicated by the gentleman are reached.

Mr. YOUNG. It will not take more than twenty minutes to dispose of them.

The SPEAKER. That arrangement can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I must object to any arrangement of that kind, because I want to sustain the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in bringing the tariff to discussion and vote.

Mr. WOOD. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means requires no aid or assistance from the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to bringing up the tariff bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to any order being made that would interfere with that.

Mr. WOOD. I give notice that it is my intention to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. YOUNG. I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and I will raise the question of consideration when we get there.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The last business, I understand, was going to the Speaker's table. Does not that bring up as unfinished business the bill in relation to the Hot Springs reservation?

The SPEAKER. There was a bill by unanimous consent taken from the Speaker's table, but the House has not determined to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask the House to hear the proposition which I send to the desk. If it be agreed to I will waive the question of consideration in regard to the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

That House bill No. 3988, to organize the life-saving service, shall be considered on Monday evening next, beginning at half past seven, and the previous question to be considered as called on Tuesday after the morning hour, and not to be reconsidered.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill regulating interstate commerce be considered on Wednesday evening, the previous question to be called after the morning hour on Thursday.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to have it understood by the House that under the order just made there will be absolutely a meeting of the House on Monday evening. That was the intention of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CARLISLE. The order does not so provide in terms.

The SPEAKER. The House determines its own sessions. If an evening session was ordered for Monday the House might adjourn on that day at half past four o'clock, the effect of which would be to vacate the order. The gentlemen interested must take notice, therefore, to see that there is a recess on Monday.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the regular order will now be proceeded with. For my own part I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. WILSON. I ask that there be a session of the House next Tuesday evening, and that it be set apart for the consideration of the Mexican award bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. Let the gentleman's proposition be modified so that the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, that the business thereon may be cleared off in its order.

Mr. YOUNG. You can raise the question of consideration after we get into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia is to take the bill he has indicated out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YOUNG. I did not so understand. What is the gentleman's motion?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that there be an evening session on Tuesday next at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., the object being to take from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the Mexican award bill, for consideration in the House.

Mr. CONGER. To be considered as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CONGER. Then it would be open to amendment.

The SPEAKER. Yes, unless the House should determine otherwise by seconding the previous question. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

Subsequently, Mr. BAYNE withdrew his objection, and there being no further objection, the order was made.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask unanimous consent that it be ordered that the House on Wednesday night, as in Committee of the Whole, shall consider the Private Calendar as on objection day.

Mr. FORT. We have been passing bills of that kind all the time and no opportunity has been given to consider other bills just as meritorious. I object.

Mr. BURCHARD. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 63.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think gentlemen have voted under a misapprehension. A number of gentlemen on my left believed they were going into Committee of the Whole to take up the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] in reference to internal revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman has heretofore stated his object was to reach two bills, one of which relates to the construction of the custom-house at Memphis, Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That would take the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] off the floor.

The SPEAKER. It would, because the bill of the gentleman from Illinois is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. If the motion is agreed to it would bring up the business of the Public Calendar in its regular order.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is the first business?

Mr. CARLISLE. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill granting pensions to Mexican soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The first business that would be brought up would be the tariff bill, which is the first special order.

The question being put, there were—ayes 73, noes 83.

Mr. YOUNG. I call for tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole I move that all general debate on the tariff bill be closed in two hours.

Mr. WOOD. I cannot agree to that. There are five members of the Committee of Ways and Means still to speak.

Mr. EDEN. I submit that the gentleman from Ohio cannot make his motion while the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] is well taken. The question is on ordering tellers on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. YOUNG and Mr. BURCHARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 83.

So the motion of Mr. YOUNG was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. I then desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bill be taken up and considered upon Wednesday evening next. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the House will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. YOUNG. I hope the Chair will first put my request to the House. [Renewed cries of "Regular order."]

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

The House resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore,) the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] to strike out the clause which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And when specially authorized so to do by the Commissioner, any internal-revenue agent may exercise the power conferred by law upon collectors of internal revenue to examine persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, to administer oaths, and to summon persons to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him, and to compel a compliance with such summons under the provisions of section 3173, which are hereby made applicable to cases of disobedience of any summons issued under this section.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I can be allowed to say a single word I would suggest that there may be cases where the collector himself is suspected of wrong-doing or neglect of duty, and I suggest that not to give the Commissioner this power is to cripple him in the performance of his duties. It seems to me that this provision ought to be retained in the bill.

Mr. DEAN. This provision is intended to give the internal-revenue agents the right to enter the premises and examine the books and compel witnesses to appear, and under section 3175 of the Revised Statutes to punish for contempt every person whom they may think does not comply with their orders. It seems to me that that is a great power to give to any internal-revenue agent that the Commissioner may see fit to send.

The question was put on Mr. SCALES's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 42.

No further count being insisted upon, the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

That section 3152 be amended by adding to such section the following:

The agents whose employment is authorized by this section shall be known and designated as internal-revenue agents, and they shall have all the powers of entry and examination conferred upon any officer of internal revenue by sections 3177, 3276, 3277, 3226, and 3318 of the Revised Statutes; and all the provisions of said sections, including those imposing fines, forfeitures, penalties, or other punishments for the enforcement thereof, are hereby made applicable to the action of internal-revenue agents, in the same manner as if such agents were specially named in each of said sections.

Mr. SCALES. I move, in lines 91 and 92, to strike out the words, "thirty-two hundred and seventy-six." That section of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

SEC. 3276. It shall be lawful for any revenue officer at all times, as well by night as by day, to enter into any distillery or building or place used for the business of distilling, or used in connection therewith for storage or other purposes, and to examine, gauge, measure, and take an account of every still or other vessel or utensil of any kind, and of all low-wines, and of the quantity and gravity of all mash, wort, or beer, and of all yeast, or other compositions for exciting or producing fermentation in any mash or beer, of all spirits and of all materials for making or distilling spirits, which may be in any such distillery or premises, or in possession of the distiller. And whenever any internal-revenue officer, or any person called by him to his aid, is hindered, obstructed, or prevented by any distiller or by any workman, or other person acting for such distiller, or in his employ, from entering into any such distillery or building or place as aforesaid; or any such officer is by the distiller, or his workman, or any person in his employ, prevented or hindered from, or opposed, or obstructed, or molested in the performance of his duty under the internal-revenue laws, in any respect, the distiller shall forfeit the sum of $1,000. And whenever any officer, having demanded admittance into a distillery or distillery premises, and having declared his name and office, is not admitted into such distillery or premises by the distiller or other person having charge thereof, it shall be lawful for such officer at all times, as well by night as by day, to break open by force any of the doors or windows, or to break through any of the walls of such distillery or premises necessary to be broken open or through, to enable him to enter the said distillery or premises; and the distiller shall forfeit the sum of $1,000.

The object of this amendment is not to give these agents that power. The collectors and deputy collectors already have it, and I do not want agents, appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to have the right to go to a man's business place at any hour of the day or night without a warrant, whether he be honest or dishonest, and examine his place of business, and therefore I move to strike out those words.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman might as well offer an amendment to dispense entirely with these officers.

Mr. SCALES. Will not the amendment leave the law as it is now? There are already certain officers who have this power now. I do not want to add to the number who have the power; I think there is as much power in the hands of the officers of the Internal-Revenue department as they ought to have.

Mr. BURCHARD. The clause which we have just passed and which the committee agreed to strike out, gave to the agents, to the same extent the collector now has it, the power to administer oaths and to examine persons, books, papers, &c. This simply gives power to the agents to enter upon the premises of the distiller, for instance, or the brewer, or the tobacco manufacturer, or any establishment for the manufacture of the articles upon which we collect our taxes. And this proposes to allow these special agents, these officers whose business it is to detect frauds, to go upon the premises, to enter upon them and make an examination there, and I can see no objection to giving that power. Probably the agent has the power now, but in order that it may be definite, that no manufacturer shall say to an officer who represents the Internal-Revenue Bureau that the law does not expressly say you shall go upon my premises, we put it in the law in express terms, and I cannot see why an officer whose business it is to examine and detect violations of law shall not be permitted to go upon the premises and make the examinations necessary for such detection.

Mr. SCALES. Just one word. The only difference between the gentleman and myself is this. Some of the officers of the Internal-Revenue department have under the existing statute this power, and the gentleman asks that the same power shall be given to such agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall hereafter appoint. I am willing that it shall remain as it is, that every revenue officer now provided for by law shall have such power, but I am unwilling that every officer who shall be appointed, not by law but under the regulations of the Department by the Commissioner as a detective or spy, as an agent, shall have the power at any time, under any circumstances, at any hour of the night or day to go upon a man's premises and look into his business. No man is exempt. It is not necessary that there shall be probable cause, but every man is held liable, at any time, to have one of these agents come down upon him. I think for the sake of the revenue service that we ought to stop this thing. The law is odious enough now and I trust Congress will modify it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to know how I shall vote upon this question, and therefore I make the inquiry in good faith of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.] This provision says that these agents shall have all the powers of entry and examination that are conferred upon any officer of the internal revenue by section 3276 of the Revised Statutes. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he objects to this power being given to internal revenue agents. As I understand it the power is already given——

Mr. SCALES. To the other officers.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. To certain other officers.

Mr. SCALES. Now provided by law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This bill proposes to give the power to certain other officers, so that there may be a check not only upon a distiller but upon a dishonest officer providing any such should exist. It does not confer additional powers but confers the same powers upon additional officers, if I understand the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] And it is proposed to give this power to those additional officers in order to detect any officer who may enter into collusion with the distiller. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SCALES. It confers additional powers on a new set of officers.

Mr. BURCHARD. These agents are already provided by law. In section 3152 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to assign "any such officer to duty under the direction of any officer of internal revenue, or to such other special duty as he may deem necessary."

Now we propose in this bill to define what powers shall be exercised by these agents; what they may do under this section of the Revised Statutes, to more clearly point out and define their powers. I am inclined to think they already have this power; that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can specially assign them to duty to go upon the premises of all distillers, and that they do go upon these premises now. But that there may be no question about it we thought that it should be exactly defined and stated in the revision of the revenue laws to which this bill relates. Every other officer has the power, the storekeeper, the gauger, and the other officers, and it seemed to us that these agents should also have the power.

Mr. DEAN. As I understand, from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] the Commissioner of Internal Revenue now has authority by a special deputation to authorize one of these agents to visit the premises of a distiller and to make an examination, and to do the various other things that are mentioned in these several sections of the Revised Statutes.

Now there are twenty-five of these agents, and this proposed amendment of the Revised Statutes is to give these twenty-five agents authority to go wherever they see fit, to make any examination they see fit, to enter any premises they see fit, by night or by day, and to do so without any special direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Now it seems that if premises are to be entered by one of these agents he should have the special authority of the Commissioner for that purpose; and that these twenty-five agents should not be given a roaming commission to go over the country and enter any premises, by night or by day, that they may see fit to enter.

Mr. TUCKER. Before my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] took the floor and moved his amendment, I had proposed to move an amendment to section 3152 of the Revised Statutes. On Thursday last there was some objection made to these internal-revenue agents, because of the source of their authority and appointment. I propose to amend section 3152 of the Revised Statutes by inserting in line 2, after the word "require," the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury;" so that it will read:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, whenever in his judgment the necessities of the service shall require, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, employ competent agents, not exceeding at any time twenty-five in number, &c.

There is no power given by this bureau to these internal-revenue agents beyond that which is given under the present law to other revenue officers. I suggest to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] that there is no serious objection to the provision which is proposed here; that these internal-revenue agents, who are accessory to the business of the collector, should be authorized to enter upon these premises and make the examination that may be necessary. I do not see any real objection to that. But I will move the amendment which I have indicated to section 3152 of the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is not now in order. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.]

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two points that I think will induce a majority to approve the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.]

That amendment is necessary, Mr. Speaker, if it serves only the purpose of checking and curbing revenue officers in the exercise of the authority now conferred upon them by law.

There is no section of the Union in which the undue exercise of a little power has created greater confusion in communities and brought more opprobrium upon the people than in my own district. All the violations of the revenue laws that have been charged upon my constituents are based simply upon the fact that the representatives of the Government there have never for one moment questioned their own authority to trespass upon the rights and premises of any and everybody, be they innocent or guilty. They never consider the constitutional requirement of having things done according to law; that they must have a warrant or writ, or some other official paper, authorizing their entering upon private premises to arrest, if need be, to handcuff, shackle, or strike down the citizen whom they charge as guilty of violating the revenue laws of the land. But a short time ago, sir, if the local press is to be credited, one of my constituents, lying ill of disease, was taken by force and arms from his sick-bed and carried to a cold, cheerless jail, and there incarcerated without even the comforts of a bed, because he was charged by one of these representatives of the Internal-Revenue department with violating the revenue laws. There was no warrant issued or other official paper shown authorizing such conduct on the part of this agent of the Government.

Sir, the local newspapers received but yesterday tell me that an outlaw from an adjoining Commonwealth, who has been charged with frequent violation of the revenue laws, and even with the crime of murder in my own district, is confined in one of the jails there and put on exhibition, as Barnum would exhibit the hairy man, by one of these revenue officers as a curiosity because they accuse him of having violated the revenue laws time and again. I do not pretend to defend any such creature, and while I believe the full measure of legal punishment should be meted out to him, I can but feel that he should be held as innocent until proven guilty, and no agent of the Government should be allowed to violate the law by thus inflicting an illegal and unjust punishment.

An incident that came under my personal observation, and is not related from hearsay, will illustrate the arbitrary conduct of these revenue agents in executing the law. Two summers ago two strangers came to the county seat of my county, where there are over twenty stores, and going into every store asked for samples of tobacco. The merchants supplied them, and after testing the quality of each handed back the samples, which were thrown by the merchants toward the boxes from which they were taken. Some were thrown into the boxes, but others fell upon the shelves upon which the boxes were respectively placed. The revenue law requires the merchant to keep the manufactured tobacco in boxes upon which the stamps are seen. In this instance all those cases were noted in which the pieces of tobacco were thrown by the merchant toward the boxes but did not reach the box, only falling and remaining on the shelf outside of the box. The next morning each of these merchants, and I think there were eight of them, were arrested for violation of the revenue laws and carried off to Columbia, one hundred and five miles distant, and arraigned before a United States judge, who demanded that this willful infraction of the law could only be appeased by the payment of from one to two hundred dollars by each of these merchants. That is the way your revenue laws are administered and executed in portions of my district, and such instances are of frequent, almost daily occurrence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, no man can feel more indignation than I do at the recital of outrages of this kind upon personal liberty. But such things have nothing to do with the particular provision now under consideration. If a collector or any other internal-revenue officer of the Government undertakes to arrest and incarcerate a man without warrant of law, he is a violator of the law and is amenable to civil or criminal action. But nothing in this particular clause has anything to do with this objection which my friend from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] has urged. The only question is whether power should be given to any other than the collector of internal revenue to enter upon the premises where the distilling is going on. I realize the magnitude of the power which is given to these internal revenue officers in reference to entering the premises of the distiller; but this is an essential incident of the internal-revenue system. If we are to have a system under which we lay internal taxes upon distilled spirits, then every distillery must be under the supervision of the Government. I do not see how you are to get rid of the evils connected with the exercise of power unless you abolish the entire system. If gentlemen are prepared to do that, let them offer an amendment to that effect; but if the system is to go on, it must go on in such a way that men shall not distill whisky without paying the tax upon it.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether this bill provides anywhere for the compulsory appointment of commissioners, so that parties arrested may be examined in the vicinity where the alleged offense has been committed?

Mr. TUCKER. I will state to my colleague that when we come to the provision on that subject he will find that nobody is authorized to arrest any alleged violator of the law except (as could be done at common law) for the single purpose of taking the party before a United States commissioner to inquire into the offense. My friend from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will remember that such a provision was inserted at my instance.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. As my colleague has control of this bill, I want to call his attention to an evil connected with the administration of the present law. It is true that parties charged with violation of the law are now carried before commissioners; but in many instances the court will not appoint commissioners save at certain points, and I know that frequently men are carried fifty, sixty, or even one hundred and twenty-five miles for the purpose of examination.

Mr. TUCKER. If my colleague will wait till we come to the provision relating to that subject I will explain all that has been done in reference to it. No such evil is sanctioned by this bill. I think I can satisfy my colleague on that point.

Mr. SCALES. I call the attention of my friend from Virginia to the fact that under the existing law none other than a collector can do what it is proposed to allow these agents to do. I think we have enough of these revenue officers already.

Mr. TUCKER. What other officers than the collector does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SCALES. These agents.

Mr. TUCKER. According to the law as it now stands these agents appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have the right to go upon the premises.

Mr. SCALES. If they have such power—and I do not think they have—it should be struck out.

Mr. TUCKER. Do I understand my friend to say that the provision of section 3176 gives power to other revenue officers than the collector?

Mr. SCALES. The question is, what does that mean—whether it means an officer provided by law or a mere agent sent out?

Mr. TUCKER. But is not the agent provided by law?

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir; but——

Mr. TUCKER. Section 3152 provides for agents as a part of the present law. We propose to amend that provision.

Mr. SCALES. Does my friend mean to say that an agent is an officer? Is that one of the officers referred to?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, sir, I really would not go into that interpretation. I asked my friend from North Carolina what other internal-revenue officer there was than the collector, and he answered these agents.

Mr. SCALES. The collector and the deputy collector.

Mr. TUCKER. Of course the deputy collector can do it.

Mr. SCALES. He can go out any time.

Mr. DEAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that by section 3152 the Commissioner may, at his discretion, appoint any such agent to duty under the direction of any officer of the internal revenue, or to such other special duty as he may deem necessary. Now, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under this section 3152 assigns a specific duty to an agent in his discretion. He has some examination previously, and having had his examination, having obtained his information, he is then assigned to specific duty under the direction of a revenue officer. The Commissioner assigns that agent to some specific duty. The trouble with this section as now attempted to be amended is that it gives all this power to every one of these twenty-five agents without any examination by the Commissioner, and without his specially assigning them to any particular duty whatever. It establishes twenty-five additional agents clothed with the powers of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to roam around the country making these seizures and these examinations, controlled only by their own discretion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 51.

Mr. SCALES demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TUCKER and Mr. SCALES were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 65.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question next recurred on Mr. TUCKER's amendment; which was read, as follows:

In line 2 of section 3152 of the Revised Statutes, after the word "require" insert "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury;" so that it will read:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, whenever in his judgment the necessities of the service shall require, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, employ competent agents, &c.

Mr. TUCKER. The purpose of the amendment is to require these revenue agents to be appointed with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as well as of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all the provisions of sections 3167, 3168, and 3171 of the Revised Statutes shall apply to internal-revenue agents as fully as to internal-revenue officers.

Mr. STEELE. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 1046, chapter 16, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to strike out from the second line thereof the words "the revenue laws or;" so the same shall refer to and include only violations of the law on the subject of the slave trade.

Mr. TUCKER. To what section is that an amendment?

Mr. STEELE. It comes in as properly here as anywhere in the bill.

Mr. TUCKER. But what section is it proposed to amend?

Mr. STEELE. Section 1016.

The SPEAKER. Section 1046 is referred to in the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Chapter 16, section 1046.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the gentleman will not offer it here, as it is not germane to this part of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. They do not touch that section of the bill, so far as I can find, and this amendment is quite as applicable here as anywhere else.

Mr. BURCHARD. I make the point of order that it is not germane. If in order to any part of the bill, I hope the gentleman will not offer it here.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask that the amendment be again read, as I have the Revised Statutes before me and I can see precisely what the amendment refers to.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is evidently not germane.

Mr. STEELE. Is not germane? [Laughter.] Why, sir, according to that, then, all the propositions of the gentleman from Illinois to put limitations upon the Revised Statutes in other sections are not germane to this bill any more than mine.

Mr. WRIGHT. Tell him what you mean by "germane."

Mr. STEELE. I do not know except it is first cousin to Germany. [Laughter.]

Now, with great respect, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend the proposition I submit is quite as proper to this portion of the bill as to any other. The whole object is to put violations of the internal-revenue law of the United States upon exactly the same plane with violations of other revenue laws. I see no reason why, when, under the laws of this country a felony is committed against the United States, so it is not murder, the statute of limitations applies after three years, there should be an exception made in reference to violations of internal-revenue laws so as to provide the statute of limitations should not begin to run until after five years. There is no justice in it.

Mr. TUCKER. I think the gentleman has mistaken the meaning of the section, and I say in all deference to his judgment I insist on the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from North Carolina proposes to amend the statute of limitations, and he proposes to offer that amendment in reference to the statute of limitations to a section in relation to the appointment of internal-revenue agents.

Mr. STEELE. No, I do not.

Mr. BURCHARD. How he can make them as near kin as second cousins I do not know. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will excuse me, I desire to say that I have not proposed to add this to a section at all, but I have proposed to make it a separate and independent proposition.

Mr. BURCHARD. That shows it is still more out of order. Not being germane it cannot be interpolated here.

Mr. STEELE. It certainly ought to come in somewhere or other.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say to my friend from North Carolina that if his amendment prevailed it would leave a man who violated the internal-revenue law liable to prosecution without any limitation whatever.

Mr. STEELE. Not at all, sir.

Mr. TUCKER. That is the effect of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. STEELE. I dislike to get into a controversy with the gentleman from Virginia on the subject of law, but he has evidently mistaken the effect of my amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. The section which the gentleman from North Carolina proposes to amend is as follows:

SEC. 1046. No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any crime arising under the revenue laws, or the slave-trade laws of the United States, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within five years next after the committing of such crime.

Now he proposes to strike out the words "the revenue laws or," so as to have no limitation on the prosecution of offenses against the revenue laws. I am against that, for I want a limit to be maintained.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will examine one or two of the sections immediately preceding section 1046, he will see that there is ample provision about the limitation. The limit will be fixed at two years under the general statute. I invite the gentleman to examine those sections.

Mr. DEAN. If the gentleman from Virginia will read section 1044 he will see the limit will be two years, provided this amendment passes. Instead of throwing away all limitation the amendment will simply reduce the limit to two instead of five years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. BURCHARD. I do.

Mr. TUCKER. On examining the section I find that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] is right. I candidly admit it. But I would suggest to him to hold his amendment to a later period of the bill. There are some provisions in the latter part of the bill to which his amendment will be more germane. Just at this particular time I do not think the amendment is germane.

Mr. STEELE. I thought my friend from Virginia when he examined a little further would agree that his first position was incorrect.

Mr. TUCKER. I have so admitted.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman has so admitted, as a gentleman under such circumstances always will. But with very great respect for the opinions of the gentleman from Virginia—and certainly I entertain a very high respect for him and his opinions—it occurs to me that this amendment is just as proper to be offered here as in any portion of the bill. I have endeavored to examine the bill as well as I could, to ascertain where the amendment would best come in, and I think it will come in just as well here as anywhere.

Mr. TUCKER. If my friend will look at page 25 of the bill he will find that there is a provision in reference to the criminal procedures in these cases. If he attaches his amendment to section 9 of the bill it will be more germane than here. I have no objection to the proposition. If the gentleman desires to make the limitation on these prosecutions two years I am perfectly willing; but the amendment does not properly come in here.

Mr. STEELE. Using the word which has become classical here, I do not desire to be in antagonism to the gentleman from Virginia, and therefore I yield and for the present withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 101, after "3168," insert "3169;" so that it will read:

And all the provisions of sections 3167, 3168, 3169, and 3171 of the Revised Statutes shall apply to internal-revenue agents as fully as to internal-revenue officers.

Mr. SCALES. That is right.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the agents that are mentioned in this paragraph are not subject to the provisions of section 3169 they ought to be. The reason we did not include that section in the bill was that the word "agent" occurs already in that section. The language is:

Every officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States.

I supposed they were included in the section; but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SCALES. I think it is likely the gentleman from Illinois is right. Still I believe it would do no harm, as the other sections are cited, to put that in also.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 104 the following:

That from and after the passage of this act distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale liquor dealers shall not be required to keep on the outside of their establishments any sign showing their occupation, as heretofore.

Mr. TUCKER. To what section of the Revised Statutes does the amendment of the gentleman from Texas apply?

Mr. MILLS. To section 3269. My attention has been called to a circumstance occurring in my own town since I have been here——

Mr. TUCKER. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that he will find the sections are amended in the order in which they occur in the Revised Statutes. If he brings in now an amendment to section 3269, it will be out of place.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman will indicate the time at which he will consider my amendment in order, I will withdraw it for the present.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

That section 3165 be amended by inserting in line 4, after the words "by law," the words "or regulation."

Mr. SCALES. I move to amend by striking out the words "or regulation."

Mr. TUCKER. I offer, as an amendment to the amendment, to insert after the word "regulation" the words "authorized by law."

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman from Virginia has nothing to say in support of his amendment, I propose to antagonize it.

Mr. TUCKER. My reason for offering the amendment is this: there are a number of cases in the internal-revenue laws where it is provided that certain things shall be done under certain rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Now wherever those regulations are authorized by law I think they ought to be considered as having the force of law; but where they are regulations that are not authorized by law then I do not think that conformity to them should be insisted upon. I therefore propose to add the words "authorized by law," in order to bring them within the scope of those provisions which authorize regulations to be made by the Department under the authority of law.

Mr. SCALES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] meets my objection at all, or that there is really any necessity for it. I take it that the word "regulations," without his amendment, means regulations provided by law. My objection to it is this: that they propose to amend section 3165 of the Revised Statutes, and I propose to read that section in order that the House may understand what this amendment means and why I propose to strike it out:

Every collector, deputy collector, and inspector is authorized to administer oaths and to take evidence touching any part of the administration of the internal-revenue laws with which he is charged, or where such oaths and evidence are authorized by law to be taken.

Now this amendment proposes that this evidence shall be taken whenever the Commissioner of Internal Revenue makes a regulation, and his power to make regulations in regard to these revenue laws is almost unlimited. He may make almost any regulation for the enforcement of the law. Now, it is going quite far enough to say that evidence shall be taken and oaths administered when they are taken and administered according to law; but certainly it seems to me to be going too far when the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by his mere ipse dixit, can authorize any agent under any circumstance to administer oaths or take any evidence he may desire. There is no necessity for this. I have nothing to say against the present occupant of the position of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but I would not trust this power to anybody, and I see no reason why he should be allowed to have it. If it is necessary that he should administer oaths or take this evidence let that be the law of the land, but do not let it rest in his power, by any regulation, to do what no one else can do, unless by the law of the land.

Now, I beg gentlemen to remember that this system of laws is very oppressive and burdensome to the citizens of this country. No such system was ever witnessed or experienced by the people before in the history of the Republic. It is exceedingly odious and oppressive, and, instead of making exacting and oppressive laws and regulations for the purpose of hounding down our citizens, I say it is the duty of the Government to reduce taxes and put it in the power of every man who engages in these industries to carry them on successfully and pay taxes to the Government, and then you will collect the taxes and collect them successfully. But when you put the taxes too high you encourage the running of the blockade, and when you encourage the running of the blockade you not only do that, but you oppress the people of the country, and for that reason I oppose it. I hope this power will not be left to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. TUCKER. I am very sorry that the gentleman from North Carolina has such grave objections to this amendment; I think I can satisfy him in regard to it. There are a number of cases in which the parties ask to have the tax remitted or to have the tax refunded, and power is given to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to do so under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself. I suppose he says, in order to satisfy his mind as to the claim of a party for the remission of tax, that the party shall make an affidavit. Is there anything violent in that? I can see no reason why a collector or a deputy collector shall not be allowed to take the affidavits of parties in such cases and furnish them to the Commissioner. The purpose of this section is to extend that power not only to cases in which the law now requires it, but to where the regulations in accordance with law admit it.

Mr. SCALES. But this amendment would allow him to take oaths and affidavits under all circumstances.

Mr. TUCKER. I can say to my friend that I think he cannot point—and if he can I will go with him to eliminate this provision from the law—to any provision of law where a collector or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has the right to compel a man to make an oath or to give evidence where the party declines to do so. There is but one way in which an officer can compel a party to do it, and that is by summoning him before a judicial officer and let the case undergo judicial investigation. Now, when a party wants relief, why should he not be allowed to take an oath or make an affidavit for his own convenience. It seems to me that it is for his benefit and not for his hurt.

Mr. SCALES. Is not the collector authorized to take oaths under the law as it is now?

Mr. TUCKER. Under the law, but not under the regulations of the Department, and this amendment only proposes to extend it for that purpose.

Mr. SCALES. Have they not done it all the time?

Mr. TUCKER. No, they could not.

Mr. LATHROP. As I understand it, it is the purpose of this amendment merely to authorize the administration of oaths to parties for their own benefit, which is not now authorized by law.

Mr. TUCKER. That is all there is in it. There is no compulsion about the matter. My friend from North Carolina is mistaken in supposing that there is something inquisitorial in this. I would be the last man in the world to vote for anything inquisitorial.

Mr. SCALES. I am the last man in the world to vest power in one man to administer oaths at his discretion, and if there be any necessity for it then I ask him to amend the law and not confer a power by regulations, for I tell him that that is one thing that makes the system so odious to the country.

Mr. TUCKER. It does seem to me very strange that a system can be odious which cannot compel a man to take an oath unless he wants to take it.

Mr. DENISON. This is a provision for the benefit of the taxpayer?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly it is.

Mr. BURCHARD. The law in different statutes in general terms gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certain general powers; for instance, the power to abate, to remit, or to refund a tax under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. The law does not say anything about how he shall satisfy himself; it does not provide that he shall require the oath of the party, but if he chooses he can take the mere statement of the party. But regulations have been adopted in the Customs Bureau and in the Internal-Revenue Bureau requiring the parties to submit proofs verified by their own affidavits or by the statements of witnesses and other persons.

Now this bill proposes, for the convenience of the service, that a collector or deputy collector shall be authorized to administer that oath, no such provision now being in the law. It proposes to authorize the officer to administer the oath required. It is for the convenience of the tax-payer who goes to the collector's office, to have the oath there administered, and not impose upon him the necessity of going before a justice of the peace, a notary public, or other officer authorized by the State or United States laws to administer oaths. There is no compulsion in it whatever. It only authorizes these officers to administer oaths when the regulations require that oaths shall be administered and affixed to the proof that is forwarded.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. TUCKER, to insert after the word "regulation," in line 112, the words, "authorized by law;" and it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That section 3171 be amended by striking out "for or on account of any act by him done," and inserting "in the discharge of his duty."

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to amend by inserting, after the paragraph just read, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

All indictments or suits commenced in any State court against any collector, special agent, or deputy collector of internal revenue, for violation of law, shall be prosecuted to its termination in said court, and shall not be transferred to a United States court.

Mr. BURCHARD. I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. I would like to know what is the point of order. I hope the amendment will be adopted. It is customary in these revenue departments when an agent or deputy commits a wrong and is indicted in a State court to transfer the case to a Federal court, which requires the witnesses to go sometimes a hundred miles or more, and poor people are unable to attend; and the result is that the parties are turned loose. This amendment will allow a case to be prosecuted in the State courts, and I hope gentlemen will not object to it.

Mr. BURCHARD. Does it limit the transfer of cases to this particular class of offenses? I understood that it was a general provision.

Mr. DIBRELL. It is for all violations of law.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand it to be an amendment to the general statute of the United States relating to courts and the removal of causes from State courts to United States courts; if I remember aright, a part of the judiciary act.

Mr. SCALES. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCALES. I made a motion to strike out and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] moved an amendment to perfect the part which I proposed to strike out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] did not call for a vote on his amendment after the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] was adopted. The Chair supposed that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina would accomplish little if anything, as it was to strike out the words "or regulation." If the gentleman will move to strike out those words as well as those added his amendment would be effective.

Mr. SCALES. I move to strike out the words "or regulation authorized by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will then be taken upon that amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman had better move to strike out the whole paragraph as amended.

Mr. SCALES. That will be just as well, and I will do so.

The question was upon striking out the paragraph as amended, as follows:

That section 3165 be amended by inserting in line 4, after the words "by law," the words "or regulation authorized by law."

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out, and it was not agreed to; upon a division, ayes 27, noes not counted.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. DIBRELL.

Mr. HANNA. I submit to the gentleman moving this amendment [Mr. DIBRELL] that he had better look with great care to the question whether or not the State courts can take absolute jurisdiction of offenses of this sort. I apprehend when you come to look into the question that it will be found that he is attempting to confer jurisdiction upon a tribunal that cannot take it. It seems to me, from the croppings out that we have had so far in the discussion of this bill, and also in the discussion upon the Army bill, that in certain sections of this country there is a determination that the revenue laws shall not be enforced. A few days ago the Army appropriation bill was amended by inserting a provision that the Army should in no wise be used as a police force. For what purpose was that? It was that in certain localities the revenue laws shall not be enforced by the aid of the Army directly or indirectly.

Mr. DIBRELL. Is the Army used now to enforce the revenue laws?

Mr. HANNA. There may be a necessity in certain localities, in order to enforce the law and in the interest of public justice, that the Army be called on to aid in the enforcement of the revenue laws as of any other laws of the United States.

We know, as a matter of fact, that in given localities revenue officers are shot down like dogs, simply because they are engaged in enforcing the law. Now, if you gentlemen desire to put yourselves upon record as against the enforcement of the revenue laws, then come out boldly and say so to the country, and not attempt to shirk the question by first providing that the Army shall not be used to enforce the revenue laws, and, secondly, by providing that revenue officers may be indicted in these given localities and tried before tribunals that are in the interest of and are controlled by the public sentiment of those localities. That public sentiment, if I may judge by expressions used here, is against the enforcement of the revenue laws. Let us be fair and square upon this question.

Mr. DIBRELL. I want the gentleman to answer my question, whether the Army is now used to enforce the revenue laws. He knows that it is not used for any such purpose, and that this stump speech which he has been making is like the one he made in regard to southern claims—that there is not a word of truth in what he has said.

Mr. HANNA. In reply to the gentleman I will say that if the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the statements published in democratic newspapers in different localities are to be relied on, there has been necessity, time and again, for calling upon the Army to aid in the enforcement of the revenue laws. And so far as I have said anything with reference to southern claims, I stand by every word I uttered. I am satisfied that what I stated was true, otherwise certain gentlemen would not "jaw" over it so much as they have done.

Mr. MILLS. In reply to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] about the jurisdiction of State courts, I will say that he is too good a lawyer to contend that a postmaster or other Federal officer in any of the States can be guilty of an assault and battery upon a citizen, or can steal a horse, or can commit murder, and claim to be exempt from trial in the State courts for such offenses. The point aimed at by my friend from Tennessee is, that where parties clothed with some official position as Federal officers steal property of citizens, kidnap them or murder them, or are guilty of false imprisonment, they shall be amenable in the State courts for their crimes, and not be torn from State jurisdictions to be sheltered under the protecting power of the Federal Government. My friend from Tennessee is aiming at the protection of citizens of the States.

When the gentleman asks us whether we will aid in having the laws enforced, whether we will submit to have the laws executed by the Army of the United States, I tell him boldly, for one, that I will resist the enforcement of the civil law by the military power in any State where the operations of the courts are unobstructed.

This is a Government in which the military is subordinate to the civil power, and I do not recognize the right of any officer to call in the Army to execute the civil law so long as the courts are free to administer it. Every solitary instance in which the armed power of the Government has been invoked to execute civil process has been a sham and a fraud. The real fact has been that in such cases the military force has been used to rob and oppress the citizens. I am perfectly willing on this issue to meet any gentleman who objects to the opposition we make on this side to using the Army of the United States, ostensibly for the execution of civil process, but really to trample down the liberties and rights of the people.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] He seems to be replying to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] in relation to the removal of causes, and he alluded to the case of a postmaster committing assault and battery or murder. I ask the gentleman whether he knows any law in Texas by which, when a postmaster commits murder, that case can be taken into the United States courts?

Mr. MILLS. I illustrated by that the absurdity of the position of the gentleman from Indiana. I say that internal-revenue officers stand on no higher ground than postmasters do.

Mr. FRYE. I thought the gentleman was simply putting up pins to knock them down.

Mr. DIBRELL. If the gentleman wants to hear an instance I will tell him one. In my own district two weeks ago a collector killed a peaceable, quiet citizen; and I have introduced this amendment because I believe such outrages should be tried in the State courts.

Mr. TUCKER. So far as regards a criminal prosecution against any collector or other United States officer in a State court, it is obvious that such a case can never be removed to a Federal court. The very fact that the prosecution is for the violation of a State law shows that a Federal court can never try the case. Hence this part of the amendment is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. VANCE. Does not the gentleman know that under the practice when revenue officers have killed men the suits have been removed from the State courts to the Federal courts?

Mr. TUCKER. When the prosecution was for murder?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TUCKER. Where did it ever occur?

Mr. VANCE. It occurred in North Carolina.

Mr. TUCKER. And who was the judge that ever made such a decision? He ought to be known. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I will tell my colleague from Virginia that in his district——

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, I know the name of that judge.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. There was an assault and battery committed by revenue officers——

Mr. TUCKER. I understand that.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Committed by revenue officers upon a citizen; and that case was removed to the circuit court of the United States, where it became the duty of the prosecuting attorney to defend the criminals. I stood in court and saw the prosecuting attorney defending the criminals at the suggestion of the Government of the United States. It is the practice in some circuits when revenue officers violate the criminal law to remove the cause to the circuit court where the criminals are defended by Government officers who should prosecute them.

Mr. TUCKER. If there was anything I did suppose would go through this House without excitement it was an internal-revenue bill. [A voice: "A very violent presumption."] I thought this was a thing there would be no trouble about, no party excitement, no excitement about the Army or anything of the kind. I do say upon my responsibility as a lawyer—and every man here will agree with me—that any judge of any court anywhere in or outside of Christendom who would decide that a prosecution in a State court under State law could be removed to a Federal court ought to be impeached for ignorance or worse.

Mr. AIKEN. I will say it has been done time and again in my congressional district by Judge Bond, of the United States district court.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not care who did it, my pronunciamento has gone out against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. AIKEN. What, then, does the gentleman mean?

Mr. TUCKER. I mean to say no such cause can be tried in a Federal court.

Mr. MILLS. But they do try them.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I wish to say it has been done in the State of Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not mean to say it has not been done, but I do say there is no law for it.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. But how are you going to end it?

Mr. TUCKER. I will answer my colleague by saying that the man who would do it now without any statute would do it with a statute.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Then put a penalty in the statute to reach the judge who violates the law.

Mr. TUCKER. The man who is either fool or knave enough to do it now, would do it in spite of your statute.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia this question: If there is a constitutional provision in the Revised Statutes of the United States, why should we not strike it out?

Mr. ELAM obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. But I rise to a personal explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELAM. I have the floor and will proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has a right to make a personal explanation.

Mr. ELAM. I have been trying for half an hour to get the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. I have no doubt, as my friend from Georgia suggests, there are on the statute-books a great many laws in reference to the removal of causes and in reference to the trial of causes which have been passed within the last ten or fifteen years that he and I would agree were entirely unconstitutional; but that is not the question before us now. Those questions should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which my friend from Georgia is a distinguished member.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. The question is there now.

Mr. TUCKER. I would have the question referred to the Judiciary Committee to have those laws stricken from the statute-book. But that has nothing to do with internal-revenue laws. "Let us return to our mutton."

Mr. STEELE. Will my friend from Virginia allow me to give him a piece of information, for which he asked a while ago?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. He said that no such cause can be tried in a Federal court. Now, let me tell him it has been done in North Carolina.

Mr. TUCKER. I have no doubt, sir——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor, and was only interrupted by the gentleman from Virginia who rose to a personal explanation.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a personal explanation, too. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. Our friends on the other side are really driving me into a corner to defending all the outrages which they say have been done in the South the last ten or fifteen years; I defend none of them, and I say the question has nothing to do with the internal-revenue bill now under consideration.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman had better come over to his own side of the House. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELAM. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Virginia. There is no law or precedent authorizing the transfer of a case of criminal prosecution in a State court under a State law to a Federal court. A man who commits assault and battery in any State of this Union, or larceny, or murder, or violates any provision of the criminal law of a State, cannot have his case transferred to a Federal court. If a party is indicted for violation of a Federal law, then the prosecution must originate in the Federal court unless by the terms of the statute jurisdiction is also conferred by the State court. There are cases where jurisdiction is concurrent. Where prosecution in a State court, commenced in a State court, and prosecuted under State laws, has been transferred by ignorant or corrupt judges it is idle to give that as an instance for the purpose of establishing a legal proposition.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ELAM. No, sir; not now.

If prosecutions of that kind have been carried on, they are against the law, and, as the gentleman from Virginia has well said, no provision in a statute of this kind would prevent the recurrence of them. There was no warrant of law for it then, and there is no warrant of law for it now. And, while I sympathize with the feeling which the gentleman from Tennessee has in view, I am constrained to say I do not believe there is any necessity for this provision in the bill or in any other statute of the United States, because there is no statute which now authorizes it.

Mr. DIBRELL. It is not thirty days since a case of that kind occurred in the middle district of Tennessee, a case of assault and battery which was transferred from the State court to the Federal court.

Mr. ELAM. When it comes to be tried in a Federal court, if tried by a competent judge, he will decide the transfer is illegal.

Mr. DIBRELL. Then my amendment will do no harm.

Mr. ELAM. It will do no good. Does the gentleman propose to alter the whole judiciary system of the United States by an amendment like this?

Mr. RIDDLE. The case referred to by my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] occurred in my own district. A revenue officer was charged with assault and battery, and under section 643 of the Revised Statutes upon the filing of a petition by the defendant after an indictment against him in the State court, of which the State court after an elaborate argument decided it had jurisdiction, upon a certiorari from the district or circuit court of the United States, I do not remember which, the case was transferred from the State court to the Federal court at Nashville, Tennessee. Judge N. W. McConnell was the circuit judge who presided in the State court. This occurred in Macon County in my own district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELAM] has expired.

Mr. ELAM. I would like to have my time extended for a few moments.

Mr. HANNA obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. ELAM.

Mr. ELAM. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Indiana. I would like if gentlemen who are citing these instances would show me some law or some adjudged case in a United States court, or at least in a respectable State court, that authorizes any such transfer.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. If the gentleman will allow me I will show him the law. There is a statute that allows the removal of these cases to the United States courts when the revenue officer is engaged in the discharge of his official duty. I tell the gentleman there is a law. Here it is. [Holding up the Revised Statutes.]

Mr. ELAM. I cannot yield further to the gentleman. That is not the question before the House. The gentleman says, as I understand him, there is a statute that authorizes the transfer of a criminal prosecution from a State court to the United States court where a revenue officer is wounded or injured in the prosecution of his business or in the exercise of the duties of his office. That does not belong to the class of cases that have been referred to by my friend from Tennessee and by the gentleman on my left.

The case the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee would reach would be this: that where a prosecution is regularly and lawfully commenced in a State court for the violation of a State law for assault and battery, murder, &c., by an internal-revenue officer it should not be transferred to a United States court. Now I say there is no necessity for any such law, for according to law the trial could not be transferred in any such case.

Mr. BURCHARD. I insist on the point of order I made.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Will the gentleman allow me to refer to one single section of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. BURCHARD. Gentlemen have traveled away from the subject-matter of this internal-revenue bill. We desire to keep all politics if possible out of this, which is a mere business law for the collection of the revenue more efficiently if possible and relieving some of the rigors and hardships of the law as it now exists.

Now the point of order I made on this is that here is a general amendment that proposes to amend the judiciary act; a general amendment not confined to this particular section under consideration. Section 643 gives the power of removal from the State court to a United States court in certain cases arising under the revenue laws or on account of any right or title claimed by any officer acting under such laws, and also in questions arising out of the civil-rights act. Now I hold, Mr. Speaker, that it is not germane to this particular section to propose a general amendment to the law. I hope the House will avoid entering upon the broad field of political discussion and come back to this particular subject.

Mr. RIDDLE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to address the Chair on the point of order?

Mr. RIDDLE. Yes, sir. I desire to have read section 643 of the Revised Statutes in order to show the application of the amendment offered by my friend from Tennessee. It is the provision under which all those cases are transferred from the State courts to district and circuit courts of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 643. When any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of a State against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States now or hereafter enacted, or against any person acting under or by authority of any such officer, on account of any act done under color of his office or of any such law, or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by such officer or other person under any such law; or is commenced against any person holding property or estate by title derived from any such officer, and affects the validity of any such revenue law; or is commenced against any officer of the United States, or other person, on account of any act done under the provisions of title 25, "The Elective Franchise," or on account of any right, title or authority claimed by such officer or other person under any of the said provisions, the said suit or prosecution may, at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof, be removed for trial into the circuit court next to be holden in the district where the same is pending, upon the petition of such defendant to said circuit court, and in the following manner: said petition shall set forth the nature of the suit or prosecution, and be verified by affidavit; and, together with a certificate signed by an attorney or counselor at law of some court of record of the State where such suit or prosecution is commenced, or of the United States, stating that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes them to be true, shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, or if it be not, to the clerk thereof at his office, and shall be filed in said office.

Mr. RIDDLE. I now ask to have read the passage which I have marked in Abbott's United States Practice.

The Clerk read as follows:

In 1866 the internal-revenue law was revised and re-enacted. In reference to suits against revenue officers or persons acting under them, the act contains a provision similar to that above stated in reference to revenue causes under the act of 1833. This provision enacts "that in any case, civil or criminal, where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in any court of any State—

"Against any officer of the United States appointed under or acting by authority of the act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' passed June 30, 1864, or of any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof; or,

"Against any person acting under or by authority of any such officer on account of any act done under color of his office; or,

"Against any person holding property or estate by title derived from any such officer, concerning such property or estate, and affecting the validity of this act or acts of which it is amendatory,"

The proceedings may be removed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The clause of the bill under consideration proposes to amend section 3171 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the words "for or on account of any act by him done" and inserting the words "in the discharge of his." Section 3171 relates alone to the jurisdiction of courts in suits brought by officers of the Internal-Revenue Bureau for damages on account of injuries sustained by them while in the discharge of their duties. It has no relation whatever to any criminal prosecution or civil suit against revenue officers, but only, as stated, to suits brought by internal-revenue officers to recover damages for injuries sustained in the discharge of their duties. Now the amendment proposed is a very comprehensive one. By its terms it purports to be an amendment to this section of the Revised Statutes, but in effect it proposes to make no change in that section, but proposes legislation on another subject not having any connection with this section. It reads as follows:

All indictments or suits commenced in any State court against any collector, special agent, or deputy collector of internal revenue for violation of law, shall be prosecuted to its termination in said court, and shall not be transferred to a United States court.

That amendment, if adopted, would change, not only the judiciary act of 1789, which provides for the removal of civil suits from State to United States courts, but two or three other statutes on the same subject. Under that amendment, if adopted, an internal-revenue officer would be prohibited from removing any civil suit brought against him in a State other than the one in which he resides, from the State court to a United States court, although the civil suit did not arise out of any official transaction. The general subject to which this bill relates is the internal-revenue laws, and this amendment proposes to change laws which have no relation to internal revenue whatever, and the Chair is therefore constrained to rule that the amendment is not germane and is not in order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

That section 13, of the act entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1875, be amended by striking out from the proviso of said section the words "except within one year after such services are rendered," and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "If more than one year has elapsed since the close of the fiscal year in which the services are rendered;" and also by striking out from the last paragraph of the said proviso the words "which may have happened by death or resignation," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "occurring."

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to strike out lines 116, 117, 118, down to the words "and seventy-five" in line 119, as follows:

That section 13, of the act entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1875.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the act entitled "An act to amend the existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1875, be amended as follows, namely: that section 12, be amended by striking out from the third line of said section the words, (volume 18, United States Statutes-at-Large, page 304,) "by him," and inserting after the word "service" at the end of the third line, the following:

And such allowance as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; allowance shall also be made in like manner for salary and for expenses of collectors, the whole of which shall be in lieu of the salary and commissions heretofore provided by law: Provided, however, That the salary of collectors shall be fixed at $2,000 each per annum, where the annual collections amount to $25,000 or less, and shall, by the Secretary, on the recommendation of the Commissioner, be graduated up to the maximum limit of $4,500, which latter sum shall be allowed in all cases where the collections amount to $1,000,000 or upward, and the collector shall have power.

The question was put upon Mr. BURCHARD's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

And it is hereby further provided, That for the preparation and approval by the United States district attorney of each deed as above required, a fee of $5 shall be allowed to that officer, to be paid by the United States.

Mr. HANNA. I think there ought to be added to that the words "which he shall account for in his emolument returns."

Mr. TUCKER. We have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HANNA was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That section 3208 be amended by striking out the first sentence thereof ending with the words "for the payment of such debts," and by inserting in lieu thereof as follows:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have charge of all real estate which is now or shall become the property of the United States by judgment of forfeiture under the internal-revenue laws, or which has been or shall be assigned, set off, or conveyed by purchase or otherwise to the United States in payment of debts arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, or which has been or shall be vested in the United States by mortgage or other security for the payment of such debts, and of all trusts created for the use of the United States in payment of such debts due them; and, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may at public vendue, and upon not less than twenty days' notice, sell and dispose of all real estate owned or held by the United States as aforesaid; and until such sale the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may lease such real estate owned as aforesaid, on such terms and for such period as they shall deem expedient.

Mr. LATHROP. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the word, "deeds" the words "or penalties;" so that it will read "conveyed by purchase or otherwise to the United States in payment of debts or penalties arising under the laws relating to internal revenue," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to insert after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3223 be amended by inserting after the word "insurance," in line 3, the words "for a sum greater than the actual value of the distilled spirits before and without the tax being paid."

Mr. TUCKER. In the revision and refunding of taxes, where the spirits have been destroyed by fire, the present law provides that "when the owners of distilled spirits in the cases provided for by the two preceding sections may be indemnified against such tax by a valid claim of insurance, the tax shall not be remitted to the extent of such insurance."

As the value of the whisky before it is taxed may be, we will say, fifty cents a gallon, and the tax put upon it is ninety cents a gallon, making a total of one hundred and forty cents, and the party insures for one-half of that full amount, he will in fact be insuring the tax due to the United States, and not his own property. My attention has been called to this matter by distillers as interfering with their insuring their own property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

That section 3224 be amended by adding thereto the words "unless it shall be made to appear to a judge or court of the United States having jurisdiction where the same is assessed and collected, that such tax is illegal, or that the officer has transcended his legal authority, and that the injury which would be done to the person assessed could not be adequately compensated in damages recovered by action at law against the officer assessing and collecting the same."

Mr. TUCKER. In order to make the section more intelligible, I move to insert after the word "collected" the word "either;" so that it will read:

Unless it shall be made to appear to a judge or court of the United States having jurisdiction where the same is assessed and collected, either that such tax is illegal, or that the officer has transcended his legal authority, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

DISTILLED SPIRITS.

SEC. 5. That the Revised Statutes be amended as follows, namely:

That section 3251 be amended by striking out the words, "And any fractional part of a gallon amounting to one-half gallon or over in a cask or package shall be taxed as a gallon, and any fractional part of a gallon less than one-half gallon in any cask or package shall be exempt from tax," and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The tax on any fractional part of a gallon of spirits in any cask or package shall be collected at the same proportional rate and at the same time as the tax on the full gallons contained in such cask or package, and the collector shall receipt, report, and account for the same in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

Mr. RIDDLE. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph last read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That when any distilled spirits are destroyed by fire or otherwise, after the time when the same should have been drawn off by the gauger and placed in the warehouse of the manufacturer, no tax shall be collected for such spirits so destroyed, or if improperly collected it shall be refunded.

Mr. RIDDLE. I had a case from my own district during this Congress, where a gauger was to have been at the distillery and drawn off the spirits on the 6th day of December. He did not get there until the 8th day of December, and on the night of the 7th the distillery was destroyed.

Under a decision of the Internal-Revenue Bureau, as soon as the spirits came into being the right of the Government to the tax attaches and it is the duty of the Government to collect it. In the instance to which I refer the Government did collect the tax, and I was under the necessity of introducing a bill which passed this House to refund that tax. The predecessor of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue said that in all such cases the bureau ought to have the right to refund the tax. There is no such authority now. The manufacturer himself had no right to draw off the spirits.

Mr. BURCHARD. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RIDDLE] that there is a subsequent portion of this bill which I think will be a more appropriate place for his amendment; where we propose to give the Commissioner authority to refund taxes in certain cases.

Mr. RIDDLE. If the gentleman will call my attention to that part of the bill when it is reached, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will do so.

Mr. TUCKER. If we do not come across any appropriate place, there will be no objection to recurring to a portion of the bill where the amendment would be appropriate.

Mr. RIDDLE. It can come in at the end of the bill just as well. I will withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That section 3276 and section 3286 be amended by inserting before the words "one thousand dollars" wherever they occur in each of said sections the words "not exceeding."

Mr. BURDICK. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3282 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "or any vapor of alcoholic spirits," immediately following the word "alcohol," in the eighth line of said section, and also by striking out the words at the close of said section, namely: "But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the distillation of such fermented liquids except in an authorized distillery," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "But no worm, goose-neck, pipe, conductor, or contrivance of any description whatsoever, whereby vapor might in any manner be conveyed away and converted into distilled spirits, shall be used or employed or be fastened to or connected with any vaporizing apparatus used for the manufacture of vinegar; nor shall any worm be permitted on or near the premises where such vaporizing process is carried on. But it shall be lawful for manufacturers of vinegar to separate by a vaporizing process the alcoholic property from the mash produced by them, and condense the same by introducing it into the water or other liquid used in making vinegar. And all the provisions of sections 3276, 3277, and 3278 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby extended and made applicable to all premises whereon vinegar is manufactured, to all manufacturers of vinegar and their workmen, or other persons employed by them."

Mr. BURDICK. The object of this amendment is to permit the manufacture of vinegar from grain by the vaporizing process, without subjecting the manufacturers to taxation as distillers. I presume there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. In 1870, I think it was, the law was modified so as to authorize the manufacture of vinegar from mash or wort by a continuous process; but there was a provision in the law that it should not authorize the use of a still, or language that has been interpreted by the Department to forbid the use of a still.

Now, the answer to the question What is a still? depends upon the definition to be given to the law. A tea-kettle is, in one sense of the word, a still. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BURDICK] proposes to authorize the manufacture of vinegar by a vaporizing process, under such restrictions as are mentioned in his amendment. Upon an examination of the amendment I do not see any objection to it. It has been examined by the Department, I understand, and if the House is in favor of permitting the manufacture of vinegar directly from the mash, without paying a tax upon the distilled spirits, perhaps it would be well to adopt the amendment. It is well drawn, will effect what the gentleman desires, and I do not oppose it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That section 3293, as amended by joint resolution approved March 28, 1878, be amended by inserting after the words "State of ——," in the eleventh line, the words "during the month ending;" by striking out the words "and proof gallons," in the fifteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "proof gallons and taxable gallons;" by inserting after the word "shall" and before the word "give," in the eighteenth line, the words "at the time of making said entry;" by striking out the word "bond," in the twenty-second line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "entry;" and by adding thereto the words:

"A new bond shall be required in case of the death, insolvency, or removal of either of the sureties, and may be required in any other contingency affecting its validity or impairing its efficiency, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And in case the distiller or owner fails or refuses to give the bond hereinbefore required or to renew the same, or neglects to immediately withdraw the spirits and pay the tax thereon, or if he neglects to withdraw any bonded spirits and pay the tax thereon before the expiration of the time limited in the bond, the collector shall proceed to collect the tax by distraint, issuing his warrant of distraint for the amount of tax found to be due, as ascertained by him from the report of the gauger if no bond was given, or from the terms of the bond if a bond was given. But this provision shall not exclude any other remedy or proceeding provided by law."

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I move to insert after the paragraph just read the following:

That section 3293 of the Revised Statutes be further amended by striking out the word "double," in line 23 of the section.

I do not think this amendment will be objected to if understood. We have already recognized the propriety of such a change in other portions of the Revised Statutes. That section which I propose to amend provides that "the penal sum of such bond shall not be less than double the amount of tax on such distilled spirits." I propose to strike out the word "double," so that it will read: "the penal sum of such bond shall not be less than the amount of the tax on such distilled spirits." As gentlemen are well aware, the spirits themselves are in the custody of the Government, and are a sufficient security. Besides, the bond which is to be given, even under the law as amended, is subject to the supervision of the collector, and can be rejected if not satisfactory. We all know that, under the law as it now stands, hundreds of thousands of dollars are locked up unnecessarily. The object of this amendment is not to take away any safeguard which the Government now has for the collection of taxes, but to relieve distillers and owners by lessening the amount of the bond, which, under the amendment, will be ample. The committee, in another section, has struck out the word "double," and I propose to follow up that action by striking out similar language in this section.

Mr. BURCHARD. There is some difference between this proposition and the one which the committee have recommended. The gentleman's amendment covers only the amount of taxes on the spirits actually deposited. The committee have proposed to amend the law so that the general bond of a distiller shall only be equal to the amount of spirits that he could produce in a given number of days—fifteen days. But here is an actual production of spirits of a certain amount upon which a tax we will say of $10,000 has accrued. Now should the bond be limited to just $10,000? When suit is brought upon the bond for the amount of the tax the recovery would be limited to that amount.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think that the Government would be amply protected by having in its custody the spirits on which the tax is to be paid? The spirits are in the custody of officers of the Government, under their charge and control. Is not this a sufficient security? The bond is a mere formal matter. Besides, this bond must be satisfactory to the collector. The law as it now stands locks up millions of dollars unnecessarily, which is contrary to the interests of society. I hope the gentleman from Illinois, representing the Committee of Ways and Means, will assent to the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. If in all cases the spirits were actually within the control of the Government the gentleman's argument would have greater force. But though the law presumes that they are under the control of Government officers, and though the distiller has no authority to enter upon the premises without the consent of those officers, yet a fraudulent transfer or disposition of spirits is sometimes made notwithstanding the law. The object is that the Government should have not only the spirits themselves for security, but if the spirits should disappear, that it may have the bond to fall back upon. Whether this is more security than the Government ought to have, I question; it has not been found so in some instances.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Suppose whisky is removed fraudulently from a warehouse; does the gentleman say that the distiller is thereby released from the tax? Besides, I take it that we are not to legislate upon the presumption that there will be fraud.

Mr. BURCHARD. Unfortunately that presumption is very often well grounded.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. The only question is whether the bond is sufficient to secure the tax to the Government.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 37, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to renew the amendment which I proposed some time ago at a point which the gentleman in charge of the bill thought was not an appropriate place. I move to amend by inserting at the end of line 93, on page 15, the following:

That section 3279 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The section here referred to provides that every rectifier, distiller, and wholesale liquor dealer shall have a sign put up on the outside of his premises showing his occupation, with the words "rectifier of spirits" or "wholesale liquor dealer" or "distiller." The letters upon this sign are required to be not less than three inches in length. The sign is to be painted in oil colors or gilded, and it must be of proportionate length, &c. Another part of the section imposes a penalty upon any one who puts up such a sign without having paid the license. A third branch of the section imposes a penalty upon any person who removes any liquor from or to any establishment not having that sign; and in this connection there is provided a forfeiture of all horses, carts, drays, vehicles, &c., engaged in such removal. There is also provided a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

Now, this section is wholly unnecessary for the efficient collection of the revenue. No one has any right to be advertised as to the calling which any man is pursuing. No one has any interest in a knowledge of the distiller's business except the Government of the United States; and the officers of the Government can at any time go and inspect the establishment and ascertain the material fact whether he has paid his revenue tax and his license for carrying on this occupation. It is wholly unnecessary to compel the distiller to keep up a sign with letters three inches in length, to be painted in oil colors, &c.

My attention was called to this section and the enormous penalties it imposes for this unimportant violation of law by a certain transaction which occurred in the unostentatious little city in which I live. One of these internal-revenue agents who I suppose gets a part of the penalties came to our town and began to inspect the signs of the wholesale dealers. He took down the sign of one of the business men in my town and submitted it to the test of his rule to see whether the letters were exactly three inches long and whether it was painted in oil or water colors. Upon this inspection the letters were found to lack a little of three inches. Now, the penalty imposed by law in such case is $500. But the Government had received its pay for the license; the man had his license in his pocket; he had complied with every provision of the law except this directory provision inserted in the law, for what purpose I am unable to comprehend. Because the dealer had failed by the fraction of an inch to have the letters on his sign the required length he was subjected to the penalty prescribed by this section. People are sent all over the country hunting up such infractions of the law and robbing and oppressing honest dealers, who ought to be protected and not plundered by officers of the Government.

If you wish to enforce the collection of the revenue and impose penalties for non-payment of the tax and let the Government officer go and inspect the books if necessary—go and demand the information of the party charged with the payment of the revenue—I have no objection. But you require in this law he shall notify people who have no interest in the fact whether he has paid his tax or not by advertising on the outside of his place of business by a sign exhibiting in plain and legible letters, not less than three inches in length, painted in oil colors or gilded. "Every person who violates the foregoing provision by negligence or refusal or otherwise shall pay a penalty of $500." And that is not all; it further provides that every person who works in any distillery—not the party who should pay the revenue tax, and he is the only one in whom the Government is interested, but every person who knowingly receives at, carries or conveys any distilled spirits to or from any such distillery, &c., not having such a business sign in plain and legible letters, not less than three inches in length, shall forfeit all horses, carts, drays, wagons, or other vehicle or animal used in carrying or conveying such property aforesaid, and shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

Why, sir, that is a law worthy of being written like that of Caligula, high up upon a column, in small letters, out of sight, so as to entrap parties into violating it without their knowledge and then punishing them, to render its author notorious. And the injustice and oppression of this law would render the name of its author, if known, as notorious as that of the Roman tyrant.

Mr. BURCHARD. It is due to the honest distiller who pays the enormous tax, about 600 per cent., upon his product, that the Government should provide every safeguard for his protection against illicit distilling. Illicit distilling is carried on secretly. These provisions of law are designed simply for the protection of the revenue and the protection of the honest distiller. We have six hundred and seventy-seven distilleries of grain besides four thousand fruit distilleries. Notwithstanding these safeguards and the utmost vigilance, there are distilleries in remote regions who do not advertise to the world that they are engaged in distillation. There were within the last year, of illicit stills—those engaged in the production of illicit spirits without license or paying tax—I think, over five hundred, nearly six hundred. Now, the man who is engaged in illicit distillation does not advertise to the world, but the honest distiller has nothing but to put out his sign saying "I am engaged in the business of distillation, and I am willing the world should know it." It is only to guard these men, to protect them; for when there is an illicit distillation throwing upon the market 1 per cent. of the product it bears down the price, and the honest distiller must carry on his business at a loss, and therefore we ought to do all we can to protect those honest distillers.

I will frankly say if a case like that mentioned by the gentleman from Texas came to my knowledge, of a man who was standing upon technicalities of the law, a man in the service, I would instantly dismiss him. The object is not to see whether he has complied absolutely with the law, or rather the object is not to take advantage of a mere technicality to impose penalties upon honest distillers; but there should be something to advertise to the world that the man is engaged in the honest conduct of his business. And that is the intention of this provision of the section, and I hope, therefore, it will not be stricken out.

Mr. MILLS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out the last word. The object of the law ought to be simply to collect the revenue and it ought not to take advantage of technicalities. Most of us representing southern districts on this floor know that our constituents are being constantly entrapped and punished in the execution of the revenue laws. I can see no reason, notwithstanding what I have heard from my friend from Illinois, why the Government should require a distiller to advertise his occupation to the people. The only concern the Government has is to know he pays the tax imposed upon him. The Government has no right to require him to advertise in oil-colors as it is provided in the statute, or in water-colors, or to compel him to wear a band upon his hat saying he is a distiller of whisky, or to have a sign of a certain color to advertise him to the people, and then to impose penalties, not for refusing to pay his taxes to the Government, but simply for not complying with the requirements of this section, and a terrible requirement it is, or is made so by the penalties attached and the way in which they are enforced.

If it be true, as my friend says, that the officer ought to be discharged who is guilty of such a persecution of the citizen, is it not more true the law ought to be repealed which puts it into the power of an officer to oppress the people in this way? What good can come to the country from this? The gentleman and his colleague on the committee, from Virginia, did not know of the existence of such a law. Its inefficiency in aiding collection of the revenue was not discovered even by the Revenue Commissioner. It was discovered, however, by these sharpers who have been appointed to act as informers, who drag those violating the law simply in a mere technical way before the United States courts at great distances from their homes, and then compel them to pay large sums of money to compromise themselves out of the difficulty.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move by unanimous consent to go back to page 11 to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move an amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to insert the following as a new section at the end of section 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the third subdivision of section 4244 be amended by inserting after the word "provided," where it first occurs in said subdivision, the words following: "That any person who rectifies, purifies, refines, or manufactures as aforesaid less than five hundred barrels a year, counting forty gallons proof spirits to the barrel, shall pay $100: provided."

Mr. CLYMER. I will state in a word or two the object of the amendment. By this section of the Revised Statutes all rectifiers irrespective of the quantity have to pay a special tax of $200. The operation of this seems to be unjust. My amendment provides that persons who rectify distilled spirits to the amount of less than five hundred barrels a year shall pay $100 instead of $200. The amendment meets the approbation of the Commissioner and I trust it will be adopted without further discussion.

Mr. VANCE. I understand the object of the amendment is to reduce the tax from $200 to $100.

Mr. CLYMER. Yes, for the smaller rectifiers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph of section 5:

That section 3332 be amended by adding thereto as follows:

And in case of seizure of a still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, fermenting-tub, or other distilling apparatus, having a less producing capacity than one hundred and fifty gallons per day, for any offense involving forfeiture of the same, where said apparatus shall be of less than five hundred dollars' value, and not in the possession of any one claiming to be the owner thereof, and where it shall be impracticable to remove the same to a place of safe storage from the place where seized, the seizing officer is authorized to so destroy the same as to prevent the use thereof, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of distilling: Provided, That such destruction shall be in the presence of at least one credible witness, and that such witness shall unite with the said officer in a duly sworn report of said seizure and destruction, to be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which report they shall set forth the grounds of the claim of forfeiture, the reasons for such seizure and destruction, their estimate of the fair cash value of the apparatus destroyed, and also of the materials remaining after such destruction, and a statement that, from the facts within their own knowledge, they have no doubt whatever that said distilling apparatus was set up for use and not registered, or had been used in the unlawful distillation of spirits, and that it was impracticable to remove the same to a place of safe storage. Within one year after such destruction, the owner of the apparatus so destroyed may make application to the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for reimbursement of the value of the same; and if he shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Secretary and the Commissioner, that said apparatus was owned by him at the time of its destruction, and that it had not been set up without registering, or had not been used in the unlawful distillation of spirits, the Secretary may make an allowance to said owner, not exceeding the value of said apparatus, as sworn to in the report of the seizing officer as aforesaid, less the value of the materials, as estimated in said report. And for a wrongful seizure and destruction of property under the foregoing provisions, the owner thereof shall have right of action on the official bond of the officer who occasioned the destruction for all damages caused thereby.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph. In line 204 it reads:

The seizing officer is authorized to so destroy the same as to prevent the use thereof, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of distilling.

I propose to strike out the word "so," and to insert after the word "same" the words "only so far."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I ask my colleague from Virginia if he will not accept an amendment providing that these vessels shall only be destroyed where they cannot be sold? In many instances the tubs and apparatus could be sold and something realized to the Government. I have no objection to their being seized and confiscated to the use of the Government, but there are many cases where the tubs, stills, and apparatus, being of much less value than $500, might be sold and again set up for legitimate uses and purposes. It seems to me a vast deal of property is destroyed under this section the destruction of which might be avoided. I desire to submit an amendment that this apparatus may be destroyed where it cannot be sold; but I was not sufficiently acquainted with the details of the bill to know at what point such an amendment would properly come in.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, to answer the question of my colleague from Virginia.

Mr. BURCHARD. The objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia I think would be that this apparatus if sold by the Government would be immediately set up somewhere else to be used for the same purpose. I think it would be better to destroy the whole apparatus.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I am sure if my friend had seen the practical workings of this he would agree to my amendment. It is just as easy for these parties who wish to carry on moonshining to buy new stills and pay taxes on them; and the Government loses by destroying this property. It does not seem to me that the interest of the Government would suffer in any way. It would be a notorious fact in the neighborhood that the still would be sold and it would be just as easy for the Government to ascertain that a distillery was going on in the neighborhood using the apparatus that had been sold in this way as it would be to know that a new distillery was erected. This destruction of property is an absolute loss and a detriment to the community. In many instances there would be men who carry on distilling legitimately who would purchase this apparatus and put it to a proper use.

Mr. BURCHARD. The intention of this section of the paragraph is, where the apparatus is in such a locality that it is impossible to carry it off, where there is no opportunity to take it away, to authorize the officers to destroy it. It belongs to the Government. It is forfeited to the Government if parties are engaged in the illicit use of it. Now the question is will the Government make more money or can it save something by putting a guard over the apparatus, belonging perhaps to a small concern and such that two or three teams can haul it away—will the Government make more money by keeping the apparatus in this way and attempting to sell it than by destroying it? There ought to be a power given to destroy. We have guarded it so that the party who owns this machinery can have his redress against the officer if he is not engaged in illicit distillation. We protect the citizen but we do not intend in any way to protect the business. And it seems to us the Government will do better and will save more revenue by its officers having authority to destroy the apparatus than by appointing a guard and taking possession and selling and disposing of the property.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I am sure the gentleman very greatly mistakes me if he thinks I have any interest in this business.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not think anything of the kind.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I voted against my party on this question; and I will vote against any party who will give any encouragement to illicit distilling. My voice has been all my life and shall be during the remainder of my life against distilling in all shapes, even when legalized.

Mr. BURCHARD. I disclaim any intention of imputing to the gentleman anything inconsistent with that.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I desire to state, however, that my attention has been called by revenue officers themselves to this useless destruction of property, that might be saved to the Government. I would not care if all distilleries used in the manufacture of whisky as a beverage were destroyed. I would have no objection to that as far as I am concerned. But I do not think the Government should seize the property of the citizen and destroy it when it might be made useful and profitable to the Government. I think there would be hardly a case found where the stills might not be sold and used in the locality.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the limitation in line 280? We do not intend to have this apparatus destroyed, except in cases where it is impossible to remove it to a place of safe storage. We so limit it in that line that I think the gentleman must see that his objection is removed.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. On which line?

Mr. BURCHARD. Between lines 214 and 219. I will read the clause:

Every person who engages in or carries on the business of a rectifier with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits rectified by him, or any part thereof, or with intent to aid, abet, or assist any person or persons in defrauding the United States of the tax on any distilled spirits, or who shall purchase or receive or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits, required by law, has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia offer an amendment?

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I intended to do so, but will withhold it for the present.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In lines 177 and 178, on page 19, I move to strike out the words "or having reasonable ground to believe." It is the first time in the history of legislation or jurisprudence, I presume, that any man was sought to be imprisoned on such ground. The section reads:

Every person who engages in or carries on the business of a rectifier with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits rectified by him, or any part thereof, or with intent to aid, abet, or assist any person or persons in defrauding the United States of the tax on any distilled spirits, or who shall purchase or receive or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits, required by law, has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

It might be very proper to punish the man if he knew that the spirits were illicit, but to say that he shall be imprisoned or fined $5,000 in a case where he had only reasonable ground to believe, would be stretching the law too far.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 542) to provide for the conveyance of the low ground in the city of Washington under the provisions of the act of Congress, chapter 96, approved May 7, 1822; and

A bill (S. No. 1178) to provide a fire-proof building for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the mechanical branches of the Treasury and other Departments.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate providing for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on Monday, June 10, A. D. 1878, at twelve o'clock noon.

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RANDOLPH] will let us proceed with the bill and at a later period he can ask to go back to this provision.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I was conscious that it was best to go forward; but this same privilege was accorded to a member of the committee, and I am satisfied that no member of the House will be willing to make a law punishing a man for what he does unless he has positive knowledge that it is wrong. I can see no objection to making the correction now. I am sure that no lawyer on the floor who ever studied a proposition of law or was about a court-house would vote for a proposition which would be so subversive to a man's rights as a citizen as to say that when a man does not know a thing but may have reasonable grounds to believe it he shall be fined and punished. That would be an anomaly and an outrage, and I hope the committee will make the correction without further talk about it.

Mr. TUCKER. I am not particular about this amendment, but I desire to explain the reasons which induce the adoption of this clause, which reads:

Every person who engages in or carries on the business of a rectifier with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits rectified by him, or any part thereof, or with intent to aid, abet, or assist any person or persons in defrauding the United States of the tax on any distilled spirits, or who shall purchase or receive or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits, required by law, has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

The idea I had in adopting these words, which are a modification of some words which were proposed to us in committee, was that a man who buys from a rectifier spirits without knowing that the taxes have been paid upon it or having reasonable ground to suppose that they have been paid is bound to take notice of the fact, is bound to inquire into the fact whether upon those spirits at the time of his purchase the tax had been paid or not. Now, if the party knows the tax has not been paid, of course he is guilty; but if he has reasonable ground to believe the tax has not been paid, it is his duty to inquire into the fact.

Mr. RANDOLPH. But he does not know it.

Mr. TUCKER. Then the question is whether he ought not to inquire into the fact.

Mr. VANCE. Would not that provision embrace a man who should haul a load of wood to a distillery?

Mr. TUCKER. Why?

Mr. VANCE. Suppose he had reason to believe it was an illicit distillery?

Mr. BURCHARD. The clause provides that—

Every person who engages in or carries on the business of a rectifier with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits rectified by him, or any part thereof, or with intent to aid, abet, or assist any person or persons in defrauding the United States of the tax on any distilled spirits, or who shall purchase, or receive, or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits required by law has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

We want by this provision to place a brand upon illicit spirits, so that any man shall be afraid to buy them; and if he knows they are illicit spirits, or if he has reason to believe that they are, he will say: "My dear sir, I cannot buy these spirits because I have reason to believe that the tax has not been paid upon them."

Mr. HANNA. The language of the clause is—

Every person who engages in or carries on the business of a rectifier with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits rectified by him, or any part thereof, or with intent to aid, abet, or assist any person or persons in defrauding the United States of the tax on any distilled spirits, or who shall purchase, or receive, or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing, or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits required by law has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

Now, let me illustrate it. Suppose I have in my pocket a counterfeit ten-dollar bill. If I know that it is counterfeit, I ought not to pass it; but suppose my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has said, "Mr. HANNA, that is a counterfeit," and although he may not be an expert, yet a good citizen has told me that it is a counterfeit. Now, what is my duty as a good citizen? I am put upon my inquiry, and as a good citizen I have been furnished with evidence upon which to found the belief that the note is counterfeit. Now, I say that whenever any good citizen is furnished with evidence that furnishes good ground for belief that the tax upon the distilled spirits has not been paid, then if he acts it should be at his peril. The part of a good citizen is then to make diligent inquiry, to the end that he may not become a party to a wrong. It seems to me there is nothing in this provision more than any good citizen ought to live up to; I think it is right.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The very illustration that the gentleman furnishes to the House, he being a prominent lawyer and I presume accustomed to investigate intricate questions of law—the very case he furnishes to the House is an absolute illustration of the fact that this provision should not stand. Yourself, Mr. Speaker, and myself, and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] often have had bills that we did not know whether they were counterfeit or not. I do not know, neither does he know, at all times whether the bills are counterfeit or not. Shall it be said that in these days of law and learning because a man passes a bill not knowing that it was counterfeit therefore he shall be punished? It would be monstrous to talk that kind of talk to an intelligent people, and especially to a court.

Mr. HANNA. But suppose I have been furnished with good grounds to believe that the note is counterfeit, or I have reasonable grounds to believe that it is?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask any intelligent lawyer or any other gentleman upon this floor who has ever been about a court-house and knows anything about criminal law if any court under God's heaven has the power to say that a man shall be sent to the penitentiary or shall be hung because the court or jury might think that he had reasonable grounds to know that what he did was wrong? Nay, verily; the criminal law must be enforced strictly. Before you convict a man and execute him you must bring guilty knowledge home to him.

You cannot convict my neighbor upon the mere assumption that he had reasonable grounds to believe that his act was wrong. You must bring guilty knowledge home to him; that is a principle of law; and you cannot punish him in any other way.

Here is a bill that talks in the alternative. It proposes to punish a man if he knows that his act is unlawful, and it proposes to punish him if the court thinks that he has had reasonable ground to believe that his act was unlawful. That is a monstrosity, and it would be an outrage upon the rights of the citizen to say that he shall be imprisoned and fined $500 or $1,000 because you suppose that he had reasonable grounds to believe that he was violating the law.

Who is to judge of this thing? If you bring guilty knowledge home to him, then he is guilty; but if you take the other horn of the dilemma and say that you presume he knew better, and therefore you will punish him, that would be an oppression unheard of and an outrage on the rights of the citizen.

Mr. TUCKER. There are many cases familiar to gentlemen of the bar in which a party is convicted upon circumstantial evidence showing that he must have known that he was doing wrong, or, as Sir James Wigram said, "must have willfully shut his eyes to knowledge that he knew would stare him in the face if he opened them."

Now my point is this: I do not say that if a man buys liquor without knowing or believing or thinking anything about it he shall be considered guilty. But where he has reasonable ground to believe that the tax has not been paid, then he buys it at his peril. Suppose that he has the statement made to him by the distiller himself, "I have never paid any tax on this liquor," that does not make him know that the tax has not been paid; for notwithstanding what the distiller says the tax may have been paid. But it is reasonable ground for him to believe that the tax has not been paid. We meant to cover the class of cases where there is no actual knowledge of the fact, but where there is reasonable grounds to believe that the tax has not been paid. In such cases a man should not touch, taste, or handle the contraband goods without first satisfying himself that the Government tax had been paid.

Suppose, as suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] that a man goes to the distiller and he says to him, "I will still you this liquor for twenty cents a gallon." Twenty cents a gallon! and there is ninety cents a gallon tax on it. Or he offers it to him for seventy cents a gallon, or for any sum that would put him upon the inquiry, and which would give him reasonable ground to believe that the tax has not been paid.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. TUCKER] has made a very good argument, if it were applied properly. But I think it will go further than he suggests. All that he refers to would be competent evidence tending to prove knowledge, and not alone a "reasonable ground to believe," as the bill provides. The objectionable words which the member from Tennessee [Mr. RANDOLPH] proposes to have struck out are these: "Or having reasonable grounds to believe." They appear in the clause of the bill which reads as follows:

Or who shall purchase or receive or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax on said spirits, required by law, has not been paid, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

It will be noted that the penalty for "having reasonable grounds to believe" the tax on spirits has not been paid before purchasing, receiving, or rectifying is very severe; and this in the absence of knowledge. The bill makes it a crime for not knowing the fact when the accused had only reasonable grounds for knowing it, or for not believing a thing to be true when he ought to have believed it, or for not having sense enough to believe a fact which he ought to have had sense enough to believe.

I would like to know if we are coming to a time in this country when we will be so barbarous in the administration of the criminal law that a man will be held guilty of a crime in the absence of guilty knowledge. Let me put a case. Suppose that under this section of the bill, if it should become a law, an indictment is found charging a man with having reasonable grounds to believe that the tax had not been paid on certain spirits when he purchased them. Suppose that is the charge. Sir, when we have found him guilty under such an indictment we have struck down the greatest safeguards for the innocent known to the criminal law. We have struck down the rule of the criminal law which has stood the test for hundreds of years in England and in every other civilized country, that a man is entitled to two presumptions: first, that he is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty and, second, that he must be proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt before he can be convicted. The Committee of Ways and Means think guilty knowledge, the scientes, need not be proved. Under this bill, proof that the accused ought to have known a fact which he did not know is made to take the place of actual knowledge of the fact upon which the crime rests.

The very point under such an indictment on the trial would be to offer proof to raise a presumption of reasonable grounds of knowledge as distinguished from knowledge.

A single word as to the illustration used by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] in regard to counterfeit money. The very fact that a man has been told a bill is counterfeit is in general, when he comes to be put on trial, sufficient proof under the criminal law that he had knowledge the note or bill was counterfeit. Or take the case of a man to whom spirits are offered at twenty cents a gallon, when, if the tax were paid on them, they would be worth, as everybody would know, a dollar or more per gallon. If a man buys spirits under such circumstances, such proof, on his trial, might be sufficient in law to raise a legal presumption that he knew the tax had never been paid. Any such evidence as that would be competent to go to a jury as tending to show the guilty knowledge of the party. The trouble with this bill is that it undertakes to authorize some lower class of evidence which would only tend to show that a man is guilty of a high crime when he had reasonable grounds only to believe a thing and yet did not in fact believe it. If the bill does not mean this, it is simply nonsense. It makes it criminal to purchase, receive, or rectify spirits, knowing the tax thereon had not been paid.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. How do you know what I know? [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Well, for the purpose of the criminal law, if the gentleman states a fact to me and I go on and act without reference to it, not believing it, and I am afterward arraigned for my act, it is competent to prove that the gentleman told me such was the fact, and to argue therefrom that I knew it. In such a case I act on my own responsibility if I do not believe it.

It is not unfair to say that, taking the bill as it reads, a person might be found guilty of purchasing, receiving, or rectifying distilled spirits upon which the tax had been paid, provided a jury could be convinced that the purchaser, receiver, or rectifier had reasonable ground to believe the tax had not been paid.

There certainly is nothing in the history of criminal law that furnishes a precedent for this extraordinary provision in this bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. I admit that there are direct modes, such as he mentions, of proving knowledge; but are those the only modes in which I can ascertain what the gentleman knew?

Mr. KEIFER. Not by any means.

Mr. TUCKER. If I see his act, which speaks louder than words, and which shows he has in his heart certain knowledge, is he not to be supposed to have reasonable ground for belief?

Mr. KEIFER. That would be reasonable evidence, not only to show the state of my belief, but also to show the state of my knowledge, and might be given in evidence for that purpose. I go one step further than the gentleman from Virginia. But the members of the committee want to take a lower grade of evidence; they deem it sufficient evidence of criminality to raise a legal presumption that the accused ought to know what in fact he did not know, and perhaps, with his comprehension, could not know.

Under this bill, unless amended, a jury will be required to find a man guilty if they find he was too big a fool to believe what in their opinion he ought to have believed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the objections raised to the wording of this section are groundless. The language is "or who shall purchase or receive or rectify any distilled spirits which have been removed from a distillery to a place other than a distillery warehouse provided by law." In other words, if the property is not in one of the places designated by law, the party is at once put upon notice to inquire into the fact whether the tax has been paid. If the party buys the spirits at a place designated by law, then this scienter is not chargeable to him.

If this provision is objectionable on the ground urged, then we might as well wipe out the statutes of our States which provide that homicide shall be justifiable when the man committing it has reasonable ground to apprehend great bodily harm. If a man can show to a jury that he had reasonable ground to fear great bodily injury, then homicide is justifiable; and it is for the jury to determine whether he had such reasonable ground or was in imminent danger.

Why not apply the same principle here? The question is whether the man has reasonable ground to believe that the tax on the spirits has not been paid. If he purchases the spirits in any of the places designated by law, then the scienter is not chargeable to him. On the other hand, if the purchase is made at such a place and under such circumstances as to give the purchaser reasonable ground for believing that he was dealing with a party who had not paid the tax, the jury are entitled to judge whether there was such knowledge on his part. It seems to me the objections to the section should not be entertained for a moment. The jury, before convicting, must be satisfied that a guilty intent existed. There is no danger of any injustice resulting from the operation of the section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RANDOLPH, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 28, noes not counted.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House adjourn.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, the ninth report upon the improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BAILEY presented the petition of J. H. Reagan, J. P. Miller, and others, citizens of Tennessee, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Olympus, Overton County, Tennessee, to Travisville, Fentress County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Mrs. Caroline Croxton, widow of John T. Croxton, of Kentucky, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the collector of the port of New York, touching a mishap which occurred to the cashier of customs at that port now deceased. In connection with it, I shall also ask leave to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on Finance. I move the reference of the memorial to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I present the memorial of Second Lieutenant Horatio D. Jarves, of Massachusetts, in reference to a distinction which it appears exists in the statutes of the United States against second lieutenants who have lost legs or arms in the late war. This memorial shows that second lieutenants are not furnished artificial limbs at the Government expense, but have to buy them at their own expense, whereas their pension is only $15 a month, very little above that of enlisted men who are furnished with artificial limbs. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs, and call the special attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I am requested to present the memorial of the proprietors of the Congressional Globe, proposing to sell to the United States the stereotype plates used in that publication. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) authorizing copies of official papers to be furnished in suits by the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. ROLLINS, it was Ordered, That Benjamin Severson be allowed to take from the files of the Senate the memorial of Peter F. Bacon and others and accompanying papers relating to said Severson's plan for the improvement of the Potomac River and the drainage of the city of Washington.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That permission be given for the withdrawal of the papers in case of the claim of Mrs. M. L. Gager from the files of the Senate, subject to the rule of the Senate.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved That the daily sessions of the Senate shall hereafter commence at eleven o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

RULES OF TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence between our Government and the government of Her Britannic Majesty in regard to inviting other maritime powers to accede to the three rules prescribing the duty of neutral governments, as set forth in the sixth article of the treaty of Washington.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. WHYTE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing are hereby authorized and directed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing from the present owners and proprietors of the Congressional Globe property all the stereotypo plates, consisting of eighty-four complete volumes, and all the bound and unbound volumes, and the copyright, together with the fire-proof building in the rear of the Globe office, with the right of way thereto; and of reporting the amount necessary for the purchase of the same.

PRESERVATION OF ORDER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules what disposition has been made of a proposed rule that was offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] giving to the Chair authority to clear the galleries in case of disturbance. I have no doubt of the authority of the Chair to do that under the paramount duty to preserve order. Certainly if the Chair can direct a disorderly Senator to take his seat he can direct a disorderly stranger to leave the gallery; but as the question has been raised it should be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The scope of the proposed rule was also to cause the disorderly person to be arrested and brought to the bar, to be dealt with.

Mr. BLAINE. There has been no report made upon it. I have not even asked the members of the Committee on Rules about it. My judgment was and is that we cannot increase the authority of the President of the Senate on that subject. The authority is ample and has frequently been exercised. To report a rule now giving it, would seem to imply that heretofore there had been no such authority vested in the President of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was my understanding of the authority of the Chair in the premises, that he had the authority.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection myself to reporting the rule back; but to follow my judgment I should report it adversely and let it lie on the table, because the authority in the President of the Senate is ample for the purpose, and it has never been questioned. The fact that it may not have been exercised as promptly or as sharply as the occasion sometimes seemed to demand does not militate at all against the existence of the practice, and it is really essential to the very constitution of a legislative body that the power should exist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to disagree with my honorable friend from Maine about the state of the law. It is one thing for the presiding officer to be authorized to preserve order. It is another thing, in my humble judgment, and with great deference to my friend's better opinion, for the presiding officer to have the authority to deprive a disorderly person of his liberty and order him to be brought to the bar of the Senate for trial. In both those cases the President of the Senate must act by the authority of the body. Where does he get it? The rules provide what the President of the Senate is to do. We will say for the sake of the argument that they provide that he shall preserve order; but that does not necessarily involve the arrest and imprisonment, and the bringing forward for trial, of some person who in the judgment of the President of the Senate or in the judgment of the Sergeant-at-Arms has been detected in disorderly conduct. I should think it would rather puzzle a lawyer to frame a plea in bar without some rule of the Senate which would justify you in arresting one of the citizens in the gallery and bringing him down here on this floor to be tried, granting that you had the power to say that he should go out of the gallery.

Mr. BLAINE. I was anxious——

Mr. EDMUNDS. And therefore, if my friend will pardon me one moment, because I do not want to take up time about it, the Senator will find that several years ago attention was called to the subject and for that session, and possibly it is a standing order, though that is very doubtful, just such an order was adopted, as will be found on the Journal; but on looking at it I have so much doubt as to whether the order was a continuing order and did not fall with the session at which it was adopted that it led me to introduce a rule.

Mr. BLAINE. That the person might be brought here?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not speaking of that particular thing, but I should for one be very strongly adverse to having such a rule. If a disorderly, or, if you choose, a drunken person in the gallery misbehaves, the Senator certainly would not want to make the Senate of the United States a police court to try him; but we should hand him over to the Capitol police. If the Senator means that portion of the rule, I should be altogether opposed to having the United States Senate assume that authority. The power to order the clearing of the gallery is sufficient for preserving the peace. If it is necessary that the disorderly person shall be dealt with after that, he should be taken in charge by the Capitol police and brought before the police court; but do not propose to try men here for such an offense. I should not want that part of the rule reported, I am sure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Report it, and we will discuss it then.

CENTURY SAFE.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That a committee of Senators be appointed, to act with a similar committee of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to receive for the United States the century safe from the donor on the 4th day of July next.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. DORSEY, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. TELLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ALLEGED ELECTION FRAUDS.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an amendment to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 5053) to provide for the expenses of the select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) providing for the issue of arms to Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont rise to morning business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not rise to morning business. I rose some time ago to address the Chair but did not catch his eye, to ask the Senate to take up the bill reported from the select committee on presidential elections; and I make that motion now.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As soon as the morning hour is over I shall ask the Senate to take up a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have made a motion of that kind myself, which is the pending motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thought the Senator from Texas had risen to bring forward some matter which would take precedence of what the Senator from Vermont moves, if any one has precedence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but he has. If there is nothing else——

Mr. WADLEIGH. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is merely for morning business.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is not; but I should like to have a time fixed for considering a bill that is upon the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wish to say is (and if Senators will give me their attention perhaps we can readily adjust the whole affair) that the committee on the method of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, after a great deal of study, and inquiry, and discussion, and conference with the House committee, reported week before last a bill upon the subject. I gave notice then that the next week, which was last week, I should endeavor to have it taken up and considered. Circumstances beyond my control prevented my getting the floor to make the motion. I tried, but my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] with the fisheries resolution was recognized, and that took up all the remainder of the week. I now wish to have the bill considered. It is a matter, of course, of great importance, and is one that Senators can readily see can best be considered at the earliest time, that is at the furthest distance in time removed from the filling of the office which it is to regulate. If Senators have matters pressing this morning and are willing to give general consent that this measure shall be made a special order for next Thursday at one o'clock, to take precedence of any unfinished business of the night before, except the general appropriation bills, which we must all give way to of course, I shall be satisfied. I do not think it ought to take more than a day, as the subject has been so fully discussed hitherto, and as the bill is very simple. While I have made this motion to take up the bill, I will ask general consent that an order of that character be entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont asks general consent that the bill indicated by him shall be made the special order for next Thursday at one o'clock, to take precedence of all other orders, including the unfinished business, except an appropriation bill, should one be pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A general appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to make an inquiry with reference to the phraseology. Is the river and harbor bill included in the exception of the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it is. I did not intend it to be.

Mr. ALLISON. I should think, if that bill is taken up, it ought to be finished.

Mr. SPENCER. I shall ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration as soon as the post-route bill is concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we take it up now, it will be finished long before that.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so. I hope we shall take it up now. I ask the Senator from Vermont to except it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I excepted it.

Mr. FERRY. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to give my assent to this proposition, inasmuch as I consider that it will not interfere with my purpose to ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes and for other purposes. I shall endeavor to take the floor at least by one o'clock, and ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. I gave notice to this effect last Saturday at the close of the day's session, not doing more then, as the Senate was anxious to adjourn, having sat to a late hour. I shall ask, the moment one o'clock is reached, if the intervening time be occupied with other business, that the Senate proceed to its consideration, and insist upon it. I wish to say in that connection that I do not suppose it will take a great while unless Senators are disposed to discuss it more than I think they will be. My impression is that we shall conclude the bill at least to-day, and perhaps in a couple of hours.

Mr. SPENCER. I give notice now that I shall call up the river and harbor bill immediately upon the conclusion of the post-route bill. I shall not press it until after the Senator from Michigan has disposed of his bill, provided it is expeditiously disposed of; and then I shall call up the river and harbor bill, and ask the Senate to dispose of it at once.

Mr. HOWE. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that if he will in his proposition put the river and harbor bill on the footing of general appropriation bills—and I understand it is or should be upon that footing—he will probably get the assent of the Senate to his proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I should feel it to be a duty if the two measures were conflicting at this moment, the river and harbor bill and this bill, which should only take a short time, which I think is of more importance to the country than forty river and harbor bills, to put them in antagonism and to take the judgment of the Senate as to which should be proceeded with. I made the suggestion that I did intending to use language which would leave the river and harbor bill to take its chances. Of course when this bill is taken up on next Thursday, the Senate by a vote of one majority can put it on the table if it wishes to do so; but in order to accommodate gentlemen thi morning and to get the thing along, without wasting time in a fight for precedence, I ask that general consent and I hope it will be granted.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall vote to sustain the Senator from Michigan in calling up the post-route bill at one o'clock. When that is disposed of I shall insist that the business of the Finance Committee that has been pending before this body shall be taken up and likewise disposed of. I do not apprehend that it will take much time to do it, and I do not know that there will be anything then in the way of the Senator from Vermont getting up his business on Thursday; but I do object to any arrangement or understanding that will cut off the unfinished business at that hour, for I certainly think that business which has been pending as long as the report of the Finance Committee has been before this body is entitled to a respectful and prompt consideration and disposal. I shall appeal to the Senate when the post-route bill is closed under the management of the Senator from Michigan, that we shall take up and dispose of the matter I have indicated.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not want to crowd this business of mine on the Senate this morning, inasmuch as there seems to be so much other business, if I can have some arrangement by which it shall be taken up. It is an important bill, the bill to organize the Territory of Lincoln. There are more than twenty thousand people there of all parties, and there are so many good reasons in favor of its passage that I should like to fix a day, subject of course to the general appropriation bills, when we can take it up. If I can have it fixed for Friday next after the morning hour, subject to the appropriation bills, I shall be satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana object to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope the Chair will put the question on the motion I made to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill reported from the special committee on the presidential election.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before we vote on that, I hope the bill will be reported, for I apprehend it is one of those measures that will exhaust the remainder of this session in discussion. It is of that character that it is likely to do so, and I wish when the Senate votes upon it that it shall do so upon the understanding that perhaps we are sweeping away the remainder of our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decisions of questions arising thereon.

Before concluding the reading,

Mr. EATON. If my friend from Indiana will permit me, I will move to suspend the reading and make a motion in regard to that bill, which is that it be continued until the first Monday in December next. Manifestly we have not the time to consider it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not been taken up. The reading will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which has just been read.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 24.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. If in order, I move that this bill be made a special order for Thursday next at two o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order until we get it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not yet been taken up. The question is on taking it up, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (when Mr. MORGAN's name was called.) The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The Senator from Alabama if here would vote "yea," to take up the bill, and the Senator from Ohio would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. McDONALD. I forgot to state that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will say to the Senator that I stated it.

Mr. PLUMB. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on political questions; and as this seems to be made a political question I will not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

Anthony,	Hamlin,	Mitchell,	Saunders,

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles; and

An act (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands.

And this day the act (S. No. 20) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes; and

An act (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory.

TELEGRAPH COMMUNICATION WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senate would allow the three minutes left of the morning hour to be devoted to the consideration of Senate bill No. 861. I move to proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 861) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not satisfied that the bill shall pass without some further examination and discussion. The reason of my making that statement is that there has been sent to me by some one—I do not know by whom—a pamphlet relating to this subject of ocean telegraphing and the companies already existing, and statements are made in the pamphlet (whether true or not I cannot tell, for I know nothing about it) that if true would require at least some modification of this bill. It is a matter of very great public importance; and to pass it in silence without discussion at all does not seem to me to be precisely the right thing to do.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the bill is a very simple one. There are but two purposes aimed at. One is to regulate the terms for operating cables between this country and foreign countries, and the other is to make free the privilege of landing cables here to companies and persons of all countries which shall make the privilege free themselves. These are the two purposes aimed at. I cannot conceive that anybody in the Senate should object to either of them; and although I should not stand in the way of a motion to recommit if the Senator from Iowa should submit such a motion, as he is a member of the committee who reported this bill, yet if he does not make that motion I hope the passage of the bill will not be objected to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move, then, to recommit the bill. I am not satisfied that it should pass as it stands, and in the hope that some further examination may be made in the committee I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M.

ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1582) to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the times and places of holding courts in said districts;

A bill (H. R. No. 3892) to change the time for holding terms of the district court for the western district of Virginia at Danville;

A bill (H. R. No. 5065) to give circuit courts supervisory jurisdiction in certain criminal cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 5066) authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, to cancel certain contracts for the sale of lots of land made at Harper's Ferry in the year 1869 by the United States, to resell the same, and sell or lease all other real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5068) to amend the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado;"

A bill (H. R. No. 5070) to detach certain territory from the eastern judicial district of Michigan and to attach the same to the western judicial district of Michigan, and to provide for divisions in said western district, and for holding the district and circuit courts therein, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5071) to authorize the holding of terms of the United States district court for the district of West Virginia at Martinsburgh.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1896) for the relief of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 134) making appropriations for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law; and

A bill (S. No. 396) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I ask now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) There is no regular order to-day, and no unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I call attention to the standing order of the 16th of April providing for going through with the Calendar of what are substantially the undisputed cases, which is the regular order for this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been superseded by taking up other business, not informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the construction was that although we took up other business one day, the next day at one o'clock we went right on with the Calendar; and I find the order printed at the head of the Calendar in that nature. If the Chair is right, that is the end of the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the order says: "unless otherwise ordered by the Senate."

Mr. FERRY. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4286, to establish post-routes, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT TREASURERS.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I ask the Senator from Michigan to give way that I may call up House bill No. 4988, which was called up the other day and objected to by the Senator from Virginia. I think there will be no opposition to it now.

Mr. WITHERS. I have no objection myself to its being taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERRY. I will yield if there is no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. If it give rise to any debate I will not insist upon it.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4988) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute superintendents of mints or assayers in assay offices, assistant treasurers of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute any superintendent of a mint or assayer of any assay office an assistant treasurer of the United States, without additional compensation, to receive gold coin and bullion on deposit for the purposes provided for in section 254 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There is upon the Calendar of the Senate a bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes. It concerns great interests and a great number of people in the country. It has been the subject of long deliberation, and has been carefully considered, and those interested are anxious that the bill should pass at this session, or pass one body at least. I propose to move that the bill be taken up for the purpose of being assigned for consideration at a session of the Senate this evening at half past seven o'clock. ["Oh, no!"] I move that the bill be now taken up for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERRY. So far as it shall not interfere with the present order, I shall not object.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not propose to interfere with the present order.

Mr. FERRY. But if the Senate should take more time with the post-route bill than I think they will, and should have an evening session, I shall insist on that bill being disposed of.

Ms. EDMUNDS. We cannot have an evening session for either one or the other.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This bill is too important to be taken up in the hurry of the last two weeks of the session. It is a very important bill; it radically changes the patent laws. I have an amendment or two to offer and some few things to say about it. I thought it would have come up a month ago; but it strikes me it is too late now to give it the consideration it is entitled to, with the appropriation bills and the necessary general legislation of the country pending. I do not believe the bill can possibly be properly considered at this time, and so far as I am concerned I am too unwell to be here this evening to attend an evening session for one bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe it has been the universal practice of the Senate not to devote an evening or any other particular time, except by special order, to the consideration of any one bill. The extreme to which we have gone in that dangerous path, dangerous because nobody will come to a special session of this sort, has been for private pension bills; and sometimes we have adjourned to have an evening session with the understanding that nothing should be taken up but private pension bills. I cannot, for one, consent, even if I were in favor of this bill just as it stands, and candor compels me to say I am not, to appropriate any particular session to the consideration of any one bill alone, for our experience has shown us that there will be only a very few Senators present.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I make the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. There is a bill pending.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I make the motion that the bill be now taken up, and I make it for the purpose of getting a special order of the Senate in regard to it.

Mr. FERRY. I cannot consent if it interferes with the present order, which is House bill No. 4286. I am not disposed to antagonize anything that Senators desire; but if there is objection, I shall insist on going on with the bill regularly before the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is quite apparent that this will lead to a long discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his motion?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I feel it my duty to call up the bill. I do not propose to call the yeas and nays, I shall be satisfied with the sense of the Senate expressed by its vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary to displace the pending bill. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to postpone the consideration of the pending bill with a view to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry of the Chair? Suppose there were no pending order to be postponed, would it be in order for a Senator to move to make this bill a special order for half after seven to-night? The standing order of the Senate is that until otherwise ordered the Senate shall meet at twelve o'clock in the day. No notice has been given of changing that. A resolution changing it must lie over one day.

Mr. FERRY. One was offered this morning and lies over under the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well. I say it must lie over one day. I do not want anything in the way of the Senator or in the way of his bill. I think, however, that this bill especially is one which ought to be considered by a full Senate and should not be set for consideration under any arrangement which we know will bring here but a small part of the Senate. As some Senator has already mentioned, the experience of the Senate tells us that when you have set apart a time for the consideration of one bill and no other, those Senators only feel summoned, if it is an extraordinary session, that in some way or other are chargeable pro and con with that bill. If this bill, important as it is, is to be considered at this session, I hope it will be at some time when we shall have all the opportunity that can well be afforded of having a full Senate act upon it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I withdraw the motion which I made.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan to allow me to pass two small bills which have been on the Calendar for some time, changing the names of a couple of vessels in my State.

Mr. FERRY. If they will not give rise to debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think they will not. They are reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FERRY. I am good-natured, and I will yield, subject to the right to call for the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 126.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 126) to change the name of the steamer City of Chester to Portland was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now ask for the consideration of a similar bill, Senate bill No. 125.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 125) to change the name of the steamer George W. Elder to Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISSUE OF ARMS TO TERRITORIES.

Mr. MAXEY. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I would ask to have House joint resolution No. 153 taken up and put upon its passage. I have dispatches on my table which show the importance of immediate action.

Mr. FERRY. Will it give rise to debate, I ask the Senator?

Mr. MAXEY. No debate whatever. If there shall be the slightest debate, I will give way.

Mr. FERRY. I yield.

No objection being made, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) providing for issue of arms to Territories was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to cause to be issued to each of the Territories of the United States (in addition to arms and ammunition the issue of which has been heretofore provided for) such arms, not to exceed one thousand in number, as he may deem necessary, and ammunition for the same not to exceed fifty ball-cartridges for each arm; but such issue is to be only from arms owned by the Government of the United States which have been superseded and no longer issued to the Army. The arms are to be issued upon the requisition of the governors of the Territories showing the absolute necessity for arms for the protection of citizens and their property against hostile Indians within or of Indian raids into such Territories.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Secretary to read the telegraphic dispatch from the governor of Idaho which I send to the table.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOISÉ CITY, IDAHO, June 2, 1878.

To Hon. S. S. FENN,
Washington, D. C.:

The guns will be needed soon. Two men shot, King Hill Station raided, and horses taken. One hundred and fifty in Jordan Valley threatening. A general war seems upon us. The United States forces on Big Camas. Will write.

M. BRAYMAN, Governor.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to add to the bill the following proviso:

And provided further, That the said governor or governors of said Territories to whom the said arms may be issued shall give good and sufficient bond or bonds for the return of said arms, or payment therefor, at such time as the Secretary of War may designate, as now provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HORACE E. MULLAN.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from Michigan to allow me three minutes to pass a bill to which I do not think there will be the slightest objection. It is a House bill for the relief of Horace E. Mullan.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4420) for the relief of Horace E. Mullan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It sets aside and declares null and void the action of the board by which Lieutenant-Commander Horace E. Mullan was examined for promotion and restores him to his original position on the active list as lieutenant-commander. It further authorizes the President to organize a naval examining board for the examination of Horace E. Mullan, and if he shall establish, to the satisfaction of the board, his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea, then the President is authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint him a commander on the active list of the Navy, next on the list after Frederick Rodgers, and to take rank from the date on which he was entitled to such promotion.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what the effect of that will be upon other worthy officers who have been promoted in the mean time.

Mr. SARGENT. It will have no effect upon them at all. Here is a person in the service entitled to promotion who by two successive boards, according to the opinion of the law officer of the Navy Department, has been unjustly treated and been put out of the service. We are simply putting him where he was before. There is an amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Naval Affairs report the bill with amendments, which will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was, in line 7, to insert "and that he be considered as having been continuously in the service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will that entitle the party to pay for all the time he was out of the service?

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably; and he ought to have it. The whole theory of the bill, sustained by all the facts, is that he was put out of the service unjustly and unfairly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. How long has he been out of the service?

Mr. SARGENT. Not very long; about a year and a half, I think.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not like back pay, whether it applies to Congressmen or officers.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no back pay; the man has been in the service to every intent and purpose. He was never really turned out legally.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know anything about it; but to any proposition to give back pay I am opposed.

Mr. SARGENT. That is very proper; and I will say to my friend that there can be nobody more opposed to changing the Naval Register and putting people on it above and below others than I am; I have fought many a bill in my committee on that proposition; but this case is so clear and just that I have no hesitation in recommending it earnestly to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from California tell me when this officer was dismissed from the Navy, or whatever it was?

Mr. SARGENT. In 1876.

Mr. WHYTE. About two years and a half ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. By what authority? Let the report be read, if there is one.

Mr. SARGENT. Let it be read with the exhibits. The report speaks for itself.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SARGENT on the 22d of May:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4420) for the relief of Horace E. Mullan, late lieutenant-commander in the Navy of the United States, submit the following report:

After careful examination of the record of this officer, your committee find that Mr. Mullan entered the Navy in 1857, and that he has therefore been nearly twenty years in the service, dating from his entry in the Naval Academy to August, 1876, when it appears he was dropped from the service; that he served faithfully during the late war, and has seen much service in foreign squadrons, reaching the grade of lieutenant-commander in July, 1866, and that he came up for promotion to the grade of commander in February, 1875. The law requires that all officers before promotion shall pass an examination as to their mental, moral, and professional qualifications—established to the satisfaction of a board of officers, or what is called the naval examining board, composed of three officers. The officers composing said board are not even under oath to render an impartial examination, and from the record in this case it will be found to have been contrary to the intent and spirit of the law.

Mr. Mullan was ordered for examination before this board in March, 1875, and failed to be recommended by it for promotion. There is nothing in the record to show how or in what manner he failed, as the questions propounded and the answers given thereto are not recorded as the law requires.

The board having failed to recommend him, the law allowed him another year, at the expiration of which he was entitled to a second examination, but before the year expired he was again ordered to appear, February 1, 1876, before the same board for examination.

The record of the case shows that great injustice was done Mr. Mullan. The law requires that testimony shall be taken and that witnesses shall be summoned to give their evidence. Throughout the case the proceedings are covered with ex parte and hearsay statements, and there is not a word of testimony within the legal definition of the term. The same board again failed to recommend him for promotion to commander.

The same glaring defects and irregularities appear as on the first examination. No record was made by the board, such as the law requires, to show that Mr. Mullan had a fair and impartial examination. The questions asked and answers given are not recorded.

Certain interrogatories were sent out by the board to different officers to be answered by them, and some were sent to officers with whom Mr. Mullan never served or sailed, and all the answers they could give were from hearsay. In most every instance the answers returned were not even sworn to. Mr. Mullan was denied the right to summon witnesses, and this contrary to law and custom, and was also denied the right to send out any questions to be answered by those officers who had responded to the interrogatories of the board, and Mr. Mullan could not have had a fair and impartial examination, such as the law allowed him. The whole case is so well summed up in the opinion of the solicitor of the Navy Department, hereto appended, marked Exhibit A, that a reading of it will show the errors of the board and that injustice was done Mr. Mullan. Appended hereto is Exhibit B, showing the naval history of this officer. Your committee are therefore satisfied that relief should be extended in this case, and report the accompanying bill with an amendment, and, as amended, recommend its passage.

EXHIBIT A.

The case of Lieutenant-Commander H. E. Mullan.

I. Mr. Mullan was examined for promotion, and reported deficient, morally and professionally, March 10, 1875.

At the end of a year from that date, (R. S., sec. 1505,) and no sooner, he was entitled and liable to re-examination.

In less than eleven months from that date he was re-examined, namely, February 1 and 2, 1876, and again reported professionally and morally unfit for promotion.

This second examination and finding before his year of probation expired must, it seems to me, be set aside as contrary to law.

II. If the revising authority examine the record of the board of 1875, it will appear that until now it has never been submitted for approval or disapproval.

Until it be so submitted and be approved it is incomplete, and has no effect upon Mr. Mullan's rights.

Until such approval Mr. Mullan's year of suspension cannot begin; and if the report of March 10, 1875, be now examined and approved by the President of the United States, Mr. Mullan will be entitled to a year of probation from the date of that approval.

This is the second reason for disapproving the proceedings and report of February 2, 1876.

III. The two records and findings, namely, of 1875 and 1876, are now sent together to the revising authority; those of 1875 being attached as an exhibit to those of 1876. In both records the finding is the same, namely, professionally and morally disqualified.

If the revising authority examine them, the first inquiry will relate to—

1. Professional disqualification. No proof of this is furnished by the record unless it be in the assertion that Mr. Mullan was "examined."

The law (section 1501) says "his examination shall be recorded." It is not recorded.

In the absence of recorded question or answer the revising authority cannot decide which it was that failed, the examination or the candidate.

2. The next question is, is Mr. Mullan proved to be

MORALLY DISQUALIFIED?

(a) The law (section 1499) says that witnesses present shall be examined under oath. None were so present and examined.

(b) The law provides (sections 1499 and 1502) that the board may examine the files and records of the Navy Department, and shall, with their record, present to the President of the United States any matters there found which they deemed necessary to assist them in making up their judgment.

No such matter is thus presented.

(c) The law (section 1499) says that the board shall have power to take testimony.

Mr. Mullan, in his addresses or statements to the board, which he submitted in accordance with section 1500 of the Revised Statutes, and in his complaint to the Department, alleges that no "testimony" was taken, and his statement is legally true.

III.—2.

(d) The seventeen ex parte statements annexed to the record as evidence would not be regarded as testimony by any tribunal which knows and obeys the law of evidence.

(e) But if they be called testimony, still they do not furnish proof that justifies the finding of the board.

Only two of them are verified by oath. Fifteen are not. One is neither sworn to nor witnessed, and its reception was an abandonment of the rule of the board which required either oath or witnesses. Three of them are from officers junior to the candidate, who would gain advancement by his degradation, and one of those three was from an officer known to the board, as Mr. Mullan states, to be his enemy as well as his junior. Only seven of these seventeen witnesses had been his immediate comrades. Ten had not, and the board know that eight or ten whom they did not interrogate had held that relation to him. Every one of those seven spoke well of him. Two, only, of the seventeen refer to what has been his character and conduct during the last five years, and they favorably.

(f) The board wrongfully refused his urgent request to have the whole seventeen, or any other officer, interrogated as to that recent period.

(g) Mr. Mullan's sworn statement, which the law (section 1500) makes evidence, contradicts every unfavorable statement.

(h) So, also, do the ten testimonials which he produced and had annexed to the record.

III.—3.

(a) The record very improperly refers to accusations made to the Department in 1871, which Mr. Mullan then denied, and which the Department then deemed unworthy of notice.

This reference is an imputation on the Department.

(b) The record yet more improperly refers to a court-martial of 1867, which sentenced Mr. Mullan to dismissal, and adds that this sentence was set aside by the President of the United States. It ought, in fairness, also to have stated that the proceedings and finding, as well as the sentence, were set aside as contrary to both law and evidence. This reference is an imputation on both the Department and the President of the United States.

IV.

The revising authority, finding that Mr. Mullan's letter of complaint charges on the board apparent partiality and harshness, will consider the question,

WAS THE BOARD FAIR AND IMPARTIAL?

As shedding light on this inquiry, the revising authority will observe—

First. That the board illegally compelled Mr. Mullan, under oath, to answer the question whether he was ever tried by court-martial. Neither an examining board nor any other tribunal in this country is allowed to ask a party under examination to criminate himself.

Mr. Mullan might well feel, as he says he did, that the board regarded him "as a culprit, and not as a candidate."

Second. The finding of the board was influenced by facts or beliefs which are not in the record.

I do not refer to questions and answers not recorded, but to a statement of the president of the board, made to the naval solicitor, that facts and reports of a scandalous character, which are not submitted to the revising authority, influenced the judgment of the board.

This circumstance alone would be sufficient and constraining reason for disapproving the proceedings and findings of the board.

V.

If Mr. Mullan be unfit for promotion, if it be desirable to put him out of the service and to keep him out, the conduct and record of proceedings, and the finding of the examining board in his case, must be above and beyond doubt, suspicion, or shadow of irregularity; the proofs fully recorded, conclusively clear, obtained by legal methods, from legitimate sources, and irresistible in force and weight.

Less than this ought not to put him out, less than this cannot keep him out, of the service, for Congress, as in so many like cases, will be sure to reinstate him after inspecting such a record as is now submitted to the revising authority.

Already the Maryland congressional delegation have asked for careful consideration of Mr. Mullan's case, and their action may be regarded as very significant of future legislation if Mr. Mullan appears to fall a victim, not to his own misconduct, but to an unfair or insufficient examination.

Finally, I respectfully advise that these proceedings and findings be disapproved, and that Mr. Mullan be ordered before another and an impartial board, precisely as though the board of 1875 had never examined him.

JOHN A. BOLLES,
Naval Solicitor.

MARCH 3, 1876.

EXHIBIT B.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in line 10, after "Mullan," to strike out "late."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend by adding —

Provided, That he shall receive no compensation for or allowance of any kind whatever from the day—

I do not know whether he was dismissed or dropped—

he was dropped from the roll until he is restored under this act.

Mr. WHYTE. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he may accomplish that object by voting down in the Senate the amendment which we have just adopted in committee, that he be considered as having been continuously in the service.

Mr. SARGENT. I cannot consent to allow the bill to pass in that shape; I would rather let it lie over. Here is a man who was unquestionably unjustly treated. There is no reason to pass the bill if he was not. If he was not improperly driven from the service upon ex parte testimony, without any opportunity to call witnesses, upon the testimony of unsworn witnesses, upon hearsay and rumor coming in no legal and proper shape, then he is not entitled to have this bill passed at all. If he is entitled to have it passed, then for the year and a half he has been out of the service he is entitled to his pay. He has not been legally out of the service in fact because he has never been properly dropped from the roll. So says the solicitor of the Navy Department, who goes on and gives his reasons in full, sustaining the opinion of the committee.

Suppose that by some means a person entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives or in this body should be dropped out of his place—I can hardly describe the means because we have jurisdiction of ourselves—but suppose we should do wrong to a brother Senator and turn him out under an entire misapprehension, and he should be restored a year and a half thereafter and allowed to fill out his time, would it be just to couple with his restoration a condition that he should receive none of his pay for the time he was out?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why was this officer dropped?

Mr. SARGENT. He was dropped because the board so reported; they made no return of reasons. He was entitled to be examined for promotion; he went before a board who received, as I say, no legal evidence and gave him no chance—so the solicitor reports—to call witnesses, as he was entitled to do by law, and they received ex parte statements, received statements of persons who were subordinate to him in rank and had an interest in getting him out of the way, committing irregularities of the most extraordinary character, as is shown by an examination of the record and by the report of the solicitor. Under these circumstances he was dropped. He had then by law a right to a year, if the defect was professional, to prepare himself to pass another examination, but whatever the reason was it is not explained by the board. Before the year expired, when eleven months were out, he had his second chance and was treated in the same way, and he was finally dropped from the service.

If officers can be ousted under these circumstances no man is safe in his tenure in the Navy; and to pass the bill and deprive him of his pay will be a greater injustice than to refuse to pass the bill at all. For that reason I trust the Senator from Maryland will not consent to cut this man off in this way. There is not merely his honor to be vindicated, which I think he is entitled to, but he is also entitled to his pay for this time, because he was not out of the service by any fault of his own.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the pending bill, which is now informally before the Senate, will give rise to no further debate. I find my generosity is exhausting my time, and I am afraid the bill I am asking for will be overridden.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator's bill is safe enough.

Mr. WHYTE. Let us have a moment longer.

Mr. FERRY. If this will lead to no further discussion I am disposed to yield.

Mr. COCKRELL. I cannot consent to the passage of this bill allowing this officer two years' pay for no service he has done or performed, and I must be heard upon that. It is in direct violation of every principle that the Committee on Military Affairs has established with regard to military officers.

Mr. SARGENT. With all due respect to my friend, we will allow the bill to go over until we can debate it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. By the absence of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] which I understand will be during the remainder of the session, there is a vacancy left upon the conference committee on the pension appropriation bill. I move that the Chair fill the vacancy caused by the absence of the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; and the Chair will appoint the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] in the place of the Senator from West Virginia.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. BAILEY. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN,] I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Reuben J. Chewning, an applicant for a pension, was indefinitely postponed, in order to have it referred again to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent, the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 742) granting a pension to Reuben J. Chewning was indefinitely postponed was reconsidered, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I ask that the regular order be now proceeded with, and that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and the amendments suggested by the committee be concurred in or rejected as we go along with the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The Chair understood the Senator from Michigan to ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. FERRY. The formal reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The first amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, in line 3, after the word "and," to insert "the same;" so as to read: "That the following post-routes be, and the same are hereby, established."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Arkansas," in line 7, to strike out "Garland County, Arkansas."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 8, after "Washington," to strike out "Hempstead County;" and in line 9, after "Prescott," to strike out "Arkansas;" so as to make the clause read:

From Washington, via Amald's Mills, White Oak Church, and Garland, to Prescott.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10, after the word "Clarksville," to strike out "Johnson County, via Morrison's Bluff, Prairie View, Patterson's Bluff, Paris, Magazine, Booneville, and Long Ridge, to Tomlinson, Scott County, Arkansas;" and insert "to Prairie View;" so as to read:

From Clarksville to Prairie View.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. If there be no objection on the part of Senators, I ask that the amendments proposed by the committee relative to routes be taken in gross to save time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the chairman to take them by States. There may be an occasional amendment to be proposed.

Mr. FERRY. I accept that suggestion. Let us take the first State, the State of Arkansas, and adopt all the amendments in gross; and so as to each other State and Territory.

Mr. OGLESBY. I wish to call attention to an error in Illinois.

Mr. FERRY. We shall come to that soon. I ask the attention of Senators to their respective States so that if there be any error that needs correction they will call attention to it, so that it may be fixed right.

Mr. BECK. In looking over the list for the State of Kentucky, I see that there are one or two amendments that ought to be made.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will allow me to suggest that if he will wait until the State is reached he will find those items rejected by our committee have been passed at a prior time and are already the law of the land or else are repetitions.

Mr. BECK. The chairman did not understand me. One or two or three proposed amendments were sent to me by members of the House after the present bill was printed. I am not referring to the changes of the committee, which are all right. I have not been able to find all of those sent to me among the amendments which the committee report. I desire leave to insert them.

Mr. FERRY. I will answer the Senator, that I have here to propose an amendment that covers all that has been submitted to the Senate and referred to the committee, for Kentucky, and that is "from Litchfield to Big Reedy."

Mr. BECK. That is one of them, I know.

Mr. FERRY. That is all that was referred. As each State is reached, I propose to offer as an addition to the amendments in print those that have been referred to the committee; and if Senators will pay attention to their States, we shall get along without any discrepancy, I trust. Now let the State of Arkansas be taken up.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask a question. I have never been able to see the use of this long first section, establishing post-roads in this way. There may be some constitutional objection to the suggestion I am going to make; but I feel like offering an amendment, and I desire to ask whether there is any constitutional objection to it, for I have not examined the question declaring all the present public highways of the United States, the rivers, and the railroads to be post-routes upon which the Postmaster-General is authorized to put such service as the good of the country may require.

Mr. FERRY. He is already authorized to place mail service on all routes upon the water and on all railroads; but we are now covering territory that is not embraced by railroads or by water transportation; and in order to do that the power must be exercised by Congress, so that at any time when it is necessary we may pass an act. It has been considered more wise that that power should be retained by Congress. The Senator, I understand, has a bill which he has referred to the committee proposing to authorize the Postmaster-General to establish routes wherever he pleases.

Mr. BECK. On any public highways of the United States. It seems to me that would save a great deal of labor to the committee and a great deal of annoyance to all of us if it could be done.

Mr. FERRY. That may be true. It may save a great deal of annoyance, but we cannot have wisdom and care without more or less annoyance.

Mr. BECK. I will not propose my amendment.

Mr. FERRY. That is general legislation and does not affect the specific amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan proposes that the amendments as to routes, reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, be acted on by States. The question will be on the amendments proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the routes in the State of Arkansas.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. We will now proceed to the next State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan propose that the amendments be taken without reading?

Mr. FERRY. Without reading, as they are printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That requires unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads as to routes in the State of Alabama.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. Line 119 should be stricken out, as it is repeated in line 89. As will be seen on page 5, the same route is established there that is proposed to be established in line 119. Let that be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made.

Mr. FERRY. Under the head of "Louisiana," after line 650, I move to insert:

From Natchie to Kingston.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. This concludes the amendments as to the establishment of mail-routes. I now call the attention of the Senate to sections 2 to 8, inclusive, which cover substantially the proposition submitted by the commission that was appointed by Congress in July, 1876. They were charged with the duty of examining into this subject of the transportation of the mails by railroad, and to report such views not only on the question of transportation, but in regard to the rates of compensation, as, in their judgment, they should deem expedient. These sections cover substantially, with what modifications the committee and the Post-Office Department have suggested, their recommendation. It embraces substantially the single idea of changing the mode of compensation for mail transmission by railroad from weight to space. Under the present régime of post-office service we are using postal cars and distributing the mails in transitu rather than at the different post-offices, thus saving a great deal of time, securing not only certainty, but celerity of transmission. We find that by the employment of postal cars we secure sufficient space, aside from that needed for the separation and distribution of the mails, to cover the storage of mail matter. Now, every six months the Post-Office Department is required to weigh the mails under the present system, subjecting the Government to a payment of about $40,000 a year for weighing. That annual expenditure for the simple process of weighing fixes the basis of compensation.

Now, it is proposed to adopt space and pay the companies as we are paying for the use of the postal cars. The increase of expenditure under the present system would be about 9 per cent. The increase under the system proposed by this bill will be about 3 per cent.; so that the Government will save about 6 per cent. by this different method, and the railroad companies are perfectly satisfied to accept this system of compensation. It relieves the Department of this detail and this expenditure for weighing the mails and makes the system more compatible with the demands of the age.

I wish to say in this connection that we are paying to-day, under the system of weighing the mails, about four times the rate that is paid for other goods carried upon passenger trains, according to the present schedule of prices. This will place it upon the basis of passenger pay and also the pay for goods transported by passenger trains.

Another idea which is included here is rapidity, so that the railroad companies are to be paid for rapidity. We offer an inducement to them to run their trains fast, and thus deliver the mails earlier at the terminal points.

Having stated those general features, not designing to take up time, I ask that the sections be taken up and read and considered.

The PRESIDING OEFICER. The reading of the amendments will proceed.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed as sections 2 and 3, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes, upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned, to wit: Each railroad company shall be paid for the mail service performed on each of its trains according to the linear feet of car space furnished and the average rate of speed maintained by such trains between terminal points, at not to exceed the following rates per mile run, for each linear foot of car, of full-width car space, used for railway mail purposes, to wit:

Five mills and eighty-two hundredths of a mill for a speed of twenty-three miles per hour and under; five mills and eighty-seven hundredths of a mill, of twenty-four miles; five mills and ninety-two hundredths of a mill, of twenty-five miles; five mills and ninety-seven hundredths of a mill, of twenty-six miles; six mills and seven hundredths of a mill, of twenty-seven miles; six mills and seventeen hundredths of a mill, of twenty-eight miles; six mills and twenty-seven hundredths of a mill, of twenty-nine miles; six mills and thirty-seven hundredths of a mill, of thirty miles; six mills and fifty-two hundredths of a mill, of thirty-one miles; six mills and sixty-seven hundredths of a mill, of thirty-two miles; six mills and eighty-two hundredths of a mill, of thirty-three miles; six mills and ninety-seven hundredths of a mill, of thirty-four miles; seven mills and twelve hundredths of a mill, of thirty-five miles; which shall be in full compensation for such services performed by said railroads.

In no case shall the Postmaster-General pay for a greater amount of linear car space than is actually necessary for the proper distribution and transportation of the mails.

SEC. 3. The Postmaster-General shall, in all cases, decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed.

And no road refusing to furnish the facilities and to carry the mails on the trains required shall receive to exceed 50 per cent. of the compensation provided for by this act.

Mr. BECK. I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would give us some information on this question. Here is a proposition to change the whole system of carrying the mails. We have already made appropriations, I understand, for carrying the mails for the next fiscal year, and this system is to be applicable, I understand, from the passage of the act, or at least from the beginning of the next fiscal year. How much more will it cost for carrying the mails under this system than that now provided for under the appropriation bill?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator had listened to what I said he would have seen that I said at the outset when we concluded the post-routes proper that we entered on sections proposing a change of the basis of payment to railroad companies. Now, I will answer the specific questions.

On the question of economy I will state that under the present law the cost would be about ten millions and a half and under this proposed law it will be $9,400,000, so that there will be a saving of over a million of money.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell us how much was appropriated by the bill we have just passed for this service? He says it will cost ten millions and a half. My recollection is that the appropriation is a good deal less than that.

Mr. FERRY. The amount appropriated for the current year, 1877–'78, was $9,250,000, but for 1878–79, I cannot state what is the appropriation. For 1877–78 it was $9,250,000.

Mr. BECK. Then I desire to know by what authority the Senator says it will cost ten and a half millions if the appropriation is only nine and a quarter millions?

Mr. FERRY. By the estimate of the Post-Office Department, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator undertake to say that the Postmaster-General can spend $1,300,000 more than Congress appropriates for that purpose?

Mr. FERRY. I do not say that. I say that under the present law it would cost ten millions and a half, and under the proposed law, if this should be passed into a law, the cost would be $9,400,000, less by a million of money.

Mr. BECK. But if the appropriation is $9,200,000 how is——

Mr. FERRY. That was for 1877–'78. The appropriation in the bill referred to was for 1878–'79, the next fiscal year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to my friend from Kentucky that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, on an examination of this question, came to the conclusion that the present cost of the transmission of the mails would be reduced by the change from weight to linear measurement of the car used. As the Senator knows, the mails of this country are increasing in weight every year. I believe the estimate of the Department is that the increase is about 16 per cent. annually. If we continue to pay by weight, therefore, the Senator from Kentucky can see that in a very few years the expenses of the Department for railroad transportation of the mails must be very largely increased; whereas if we pay for the linear measurement we can carry the mails with the present space used if they should be increased, say 15 or 20, or even, perhaps, 30 per cent., so that we shall actually be adopting a measure of economy in agreeing to the recommendation of the committee, rather than continuing to pay by weight for carrying the mails on railroad, as the weight must increase every year. The committee examined the matter very closely, and the best judgment they could come to, aided as they were by all the information they could get from the Department, was that it was in the way of economy to adopt the present recommendation.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to state also to the Senator from Kentucky, as he was not in, I believe, when I made the statement before, that the annual increase under the present law would be about 9 per cent. and the increase under this proposition, if it be enacted into law, would be but 3 per cent. That gives the Senator the proportion of economy that will be practiced under this proposition if it shall be enacted into law.

Mr. BECK. I understand the theory of the amendment is that it will ultimately cheapen the cost, but so far as the appropriations of the present year or those made for the next fiscal year are concerned, if the Postmaster-General does not exceed the appropriations made for this year, it is an increase over the appropriations made for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that he cannot increase the appropriation; he can only use what car space the appropriations will pay for. This does not require any increase of appropriation. It only provides for a change of the mode of compensation. Aided as we were by the Department, for we had Mr. Vail before us, a gentleman perhaps who is better acquainted with railroad transportation than any man in this country, and examined him fully in reference to these points; our conclusions were that instead of increasing, this would be at present a diminution of expenses, to what extent I am not prepared exactly to say, but looking to the future of the country as well as the present wants and needs of the service, we came to the conclusion that this was the proper method.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that the appropriation in the appropriation bill to which he alludes was based upon the present law estimated for the coming year. It does not follow that, if this measure is enacted, that amount will be applied. The Postmaster-General will not pay anything more than he is required to pay under this basis, which will be less than the estimates made up on which the appropriation bill was based; so that this difference in favor of the Government will remain in the Post-Office Department if the appropriation has been in excess of the amount needed.

Mr. BECK. I will not discuss this question when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads avow that they expect to save a million dollars. The Committee on Appropriations have already made a liberal appropriation for the next year. I hope we shall all live to be here at the end of the fiscal year; and I desire to say now that the record will show at the end of the fiscal year that this amendment will have added largely to what the Committee on Appropriations thought necessary and have appropriated for the next fiscal year. If not, I shall be very happily mistaken.

Mr. BAILEY. It seems to me the Senator from Kentucky altogether misconceives the spirit and purpose of this proposition. This amendment makes no appropriation whatever; it requires no particular service to be rendered; it does no more than prescribe the method by which the compensation to be paid to the railroad post-routes shall be measured. If the Post-Office Department shall undertake to expend a larger sum of money than Congress has appropriated to the use of that Department, it will find no justification whatever in this measure for that expenditure. The Senator from Kentucky, therefore, is under no necessity for making his prediction as to what will be the result of the operation of the Post-Office Department under this bill, for this bill requires no expenditure at all. There is no necessity for such a prediction. If the prediction is to be made let it be predicated not on the terms of this bill but on the actual service of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to call the attention of my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Tennessee, to the fact that the Postmaster-General cannot exceed the appropriation in his expenditure without subjecting himself to a penalty.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, and I assume that the Postmaster-General will but obey the law; he will but do that which Congress has already prescribed he shall do; and if he shall violate the law he certainly will come under the pains and penalties of the law.

Mr. BECK. We have heard all that very often. It is so, in every case. There is no deficiency bill, either for public buildings or anything else, but what all these things are said. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, making appropriations for the next fiscal year, after inquiring into the rates paid the railroads, reported an allowance at a reduction of 5 per cent. This bill makes no provision for any reduction of that sort. Contracts are to be made under this bill for a limit of space, and the companies are to be paid at the rate set forth here, without making any provision for a reduction. Therefore I made the prediction I did, that for the next fiscal year the cost of this service will be increased.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that the Postmaster-General, whether we carry by weight or by space, cannot increase the appropriation made by Congress. If you carry by weight, when the appropriation is exhausted the Postmaster-General will not be authorized to continue the transmission of the mail. So, if he has to pay that which he has contracted for to railroads for linear space and exhausts his appropriation, he must stop contracting for any more space. I do not see how this bill can aid in any respect in allowing the Postmaster-General to exceed the appropriations made by Congress for his Department. I should be glad if the Senator from Kentucky would point out satisfactorily wherein this bill will increase the expenditures for mail service; for if it will do that I shall certainly vote against it, although I joined in the report. Unless that can be shown, with the present lights I have on the subject, with the very best lights I can get as a member of that committee, having concurred in this report, I feel bound to support it, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Kentucky, unless he will specify wherein the expenditures of the Department will be increased by the adoption of this measure.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to state to the Senator from Kentucky that the estimate to which he referred is based on the reduction made two years ago of 10 per cent. It is not made on the 5 per cent. proposed by the House and rejected by the Senate. That has not become a law. But it is based on the 10 per cent. reduction, which is the present law. You cannot expect the Postmaster-General to make his estimates upon a supposititious case. He has made them upon existing law, and on that there will be a saving to the Government by the adoption of this proposition.

Mr. BECK. As I understand, the reduction of 5 per cent. made in the House bill in which the appropriation is contained is not yet agreed upon in conference. We make a reduction of 5 per cent. there which this bill ignores, and it allows the railroads 5 per cent. more than the appropriation bill allows for railroad mail transportation. Hence the increase. But that bill has not yet passed the conference, I am told; and while the system here proposed may be an improvement hereafter, it will be found for the reasons I have given that the reduction of 5 per cent. demanded from the railroads is ignored in this; and when the Postmaster-General comes and says "having been empowered by law to make contracts which ignore that 5 per cent., I can carry the mails no longer and must stop the mails," we shall have to pass a deficiency bill at the next session to carry out his contracts.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Kentucky please point out to the Senate or to the Post-Office Committee how the committee can recognize that appropriation bill to which he refers, which is not a law; or how can it accommodate this bill to a proposed law? Shall we recognize the law as it stands, or the law as it may or may not be in the future?

This is a practical question. We are here for the purpose of settling by legislation the method of compensating the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails. We have assumed as the basis of that settlement the existing law. The Senator says that it does not recognize in any way or take cognizance of a supposed measure that is not the law, that has been rejected by one of the two Houses of Congress. Will he point out to the committee how it can accommodate this bill to suit the contingency or the exigency that may arise?

Mr. FERRY. Furthermore, in addition to what has been so well said by my colleague on the committee, I will say that if the 5 per cent. reduction now pending between the two Houses shall become a law, it will apply equally to this as it will to weight. The 10 per cent. is applied to that and estimated on it. Now, if a law should be passed directing the Postmaster-General to further reduce the compensation 5 per cent., it will apply to this, for this is no definite sum; it is only the basis upon which compensation is fixed; it is a rate of pay, and the deduction will apply to this as well as though it stood on the present basis of weight.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to discuss this any further; but I can answer the Senator from Tennessee that we have a Committee on Appropriations and they agreed to reject the proposition for the 5 per cent., and the Post-Office Committee laying down post-routes concludes to change the whole system and ignores the action taking off that 5 per cent.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state in that connection my recollection of the statements made before the Appropriations Committee. I presume it is in order to say that unless I am more mistaken than I ever have been in my life, from the statements made by the experts who had examined this whole subject when the amendment which was proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the appropriation bill was under discussion, the conclusion I reached was that by the adoption of this present plan not less than half a million of dollars per annum would be saved to the Government and the service would be improved. Therefore I vote for it.

Mr. FERRY. More than that, I stated that there will be a large saving in the way of postal cars. We are now compelled to use about a third more than are actually needed because under the present system the railroads frequently throw off cars and the Post-Office Department is obliged to equip other cars to place upon parallel roads so as not to be in the hands of the railroad companies. If the arrangement shall be satisfactory to both parties upon this basis, the Department can use about one-third less cars and save about $300,000 in the way of cars.

Mr. BECK. I am done with the discussion with this single suggestion: the Senator from Virginia has thought proper to state what occurred before the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. WITHERS. The conclusion merely, that I reached.

Mr. BECK. Now I state that Gardiner G. Hubbard, the best informed man among them, if I do not misrecollect his testimony altogether, stated emphatically that for the present year the change of system would involve a decided increase, but that ultimately it would be a saving.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Kentucky says he is done with the discussion, but I do not think he ought to expect the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to be done with the discussion after the remark he has made that that committee have determined to ignore what was contemplated by the Committee on Appropriations in reducing the expense of carrying the mails on railroads 5 per cent. and have come here and reported a bill that will increase it.

Sir, the Committee on Appropriations is an independent committee and has a perfect right to come to whatever conclusions it may think proper in reference to the appropriation bills; but I am not aware that the conclusions of that committee are omnipotent and spread themselves through all the committee-rooms of this body and that other committees have got to take cognizance of the determinations of the Committee on Appropriations. We propose a bill here in good faith to benefit the post-office service committed to our charge; and after examining witnesses upon the subject, men experienced in railroad transportation, who have had cognizance for years of that department of the service, we have come to the conclusion that this bill is for the best interests of the service. We have come to the further conclusion that it will not increase the present expenses of the Department, but that in the future it will greatly reduce the expenses of the Post-Office Department; and I cannot understand exactly the criticism of the Senator from Kentucky, who is always, I know, very vigilant in guarding the Treasury of the United States and with whom I am very happy most generally to co-operate. If he can point, as I said to him before, that this bill will increase the expenses of the postal service of the country, I shall be very happy to join him. But his captious criticism in reference to this bill, without any facts to predicate those criticisms upon, have not that weight with me which the opinions of the Senator from Kentucky usually have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the compensation to the railroads shall be paid by orders on the Treasury, and shall include the transportation of superintendents and officers of the railway mail service, special agents of the Department, and all railway mail employés while on duty, going to or returning therefrom.

SEC. 5. That all cars or parts of cars used for the railway mail service shall be of such style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner, as shall be required by the Postmaster-General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, and lighted by and at the expense of the railroad companies.

SEC. 6. That the Department may, on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, deliver the mails to the railroads and receive them at the stations. The railroads shall transport the mails and deliver them to such connecting roads as shall be required by the Department: Provided, however, That when the mails are carried in baggage-cars they shall be in charge of the railroad company until delivered to the connecting roads, or to such persons as may be duly authorized by the Department to receive them; and each railroad company shall provide at every station a suitable place on the line of its road, where the mails may be safely stored, in charge of a responsible person, sworn as provided by statute regulating the transportation of mails, whenever they cannot be delivered directly from one post-office employé to another.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster-General shall deduct from the pay of the railroad companies, for every failure to deliver a mail within its schedule time, not less than one-half of the price of the trip, and where the trip is not performed not less than the price of one trip, and not exceeding, in either case, the price of three trips: Provided, however, That if the failure is caused by a connecting road, then only the connecting road shall be fined. And where such failure is caused by unavoidable casualty, the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, may remit the fine. And he may make deductions and impose fines for other delinquencies.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster-General shall request all railroad companies transporting the mails to furnish, under seal, such data relating to the operating, receipts, and expenditures of such roads as may, in his judgment, be deemed necessary to enable him to ascertain the cost of mail transportation and the proper compensation to be paid for the same; and he shall, in his annual report to Congress, make such recommendations, founded on the information obtained under this section, as shall, in his opinion, be just and equitable.

Mr. FERRY. This concludes the subject of compensation of railways. The sections 9 to 31 are a reclassification of mail matter. Under the present law there are three classes: first, second, and third; and the second is subdivided. The law of 1876 subdivided class 2 for the purpose of attempting to prevent the transportation in the second class of third-class matter; but it was found that under this law it could not be prohibited. We are now losing at the rate of about half a million a year by the transportation of periodicals, as they are claimed to be, but issued for advertising purposes, for individual interests. This classification puts them in the fourth class, and proposes a method of registration by which it shall be determined at the place of mailing what is the character of the publication sent. It does not change the rate of compensation, but simply arranges the classifications by which on this basis it may be hereafter prohibited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question before the Senate is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads embracing sections 2 to 8, inclusive of each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee, from sections 9 to 31, inclusive.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask the chairman of the committee, as that seems to apply mainly to the classification of mail matter, whether there are any changes made in the rates of postage?

Mr. FERRY. No; I took particular pains to state that. I ask that the sections be read as one amendment, and the committee have some amendments to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The sections will be read.

The Secretary read sections 9, 10, and 11, as follows:

SEC. 9. That mailable matter shall be divided into four classes:
First, written matter.
Second, periodical publications under registration.

Third, miscellaneous printed matter.

Fourth, merchandise.

SEC. 10. Mailable matter of the first class shall embrace letters, postal-cards, and all matters wholly or partly in writing, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 11. That on mailable matter of the first class, except postal-cards and drop-letters, postage shall be prepaid at the rate of three cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof; postal-cards shall be transmitted through the mails at a postage charge of one cent each, including the cost of manufacture; and drop-letters shall be mailed at the rate of two cents per half ounce or fraction thereof, including delivery at letter-carrier offices, and one cent for each half ounce or fraction thereof where free delivery by carrier is not established.

Mr. FERRY. I desire from the committee to move to add to section 11:

The Postmaster-General may, however, provide by regulation for transmitting unpaid and duly receipted letters of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States to their destination, to be paid on delivery.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read sections 12 and 13, as follows:

SEC. 12. That mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, and which have been duly registered as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 13. That publishers of mail matter of the second class who may desire to have their publications transmitted through the mails at the registered rate of postage shall submit the same to the postmaster at the place of publication, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, together with the fee required for registration, which is hereby declared to be $1 per annum, payable at the time of registration, and on or before the 1st day of January, for the ensuing year thereafter. The publication thus submitted shall be examined, under such regulations as shall enable the postmaster to ascertain its true character; and, if found to be within the conditions named in section 17, a certificate of registration shall thereupon be issued to the publisher by the postmaster at the place where such publication is published, who shall place a duplicate of the same on file in his office, and shall renew the said certificate on its expiration, in the absence of reason to the contrary. A duplicate of such certificate shall also be filed in the Post-Office Department. A temporary permit may be granted to a publication about to be issued, when a written statement shall be furnished to the postmaster, accompanied by an affidavit from the person intending to publish the same, that it will comply with the conditions named in section 17, and that he will submit the first issue of his publication for examination, as in this section provided. Publications thus registered, or to which a temporary permit has been granted, except as provided in section 29, when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, shall be entitled to transmission through the mails at two cents a pound or fraction thereof, such postage to be prepaid, as now provided by law: Provided, however, That no publication shall pass through the mails at the registered rate unless a certificate of registration has been issued, or a temporary permit granted to it: Provided, also, That every publication, except those mentioned in section 18, admitted to the registered rate, shall have printed upon each issue thereof the words "Registered" (or temporary permit granted, as the case may be) "for transmission in the mails," which words of registration or temporary permit shall be evidence to a postmaster at an office other than that of publication that the publication bearing them is entitled to transmission through the mail, at the registered rate when presented by a news agent to be sent to regular subscribers only: Provided further, That this section shall not take effect until two months from the passage of this act.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that in line 19 of section 13 the word "may" be changed to "shall," so as to read:

A temporary permit shall be granted to a publication about to be issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The Secretary read sections 14, 15, 16, and 17, as follows:

SEC. 14. That the certificate of registration granted as in the preceding section shall be revoked by the postmaster in case the publication shall have so changed its character as to make it no longer within the conditions named in section 17.

SEC. 15. That matter of the second class shall be examined at the office of mailing, and if found to contain matter which is subject to a higher rate of postage, such registered matter shall be charged with postage at the rate to which the inclosed matter is subject: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prohibit the insertion in periodicals of advertisements attached permanently to the same.

SEC. 16. That any person who shall print, or cause to be printed, upon any issue of any publication, the words designated in section 13, to which publication a certificate of registration or temporary permit has not been granted, or who shall submit, or cause to be submitted, any false evidence to the postmaster relative to the character of such publication, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

SEC. 17. That the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the privilege of registration are as follows:

First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the registered rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

Mr. FERRY. I offer the following amendment to the amendment: at the end of line 20 of section 17 to insert:

Or publications which, although issued in regular series or successive numbers, are but books or reprints of books.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read sections 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31, as follows:

SEC. 18. That foreign newspapers and other periodicals of the same general character as those registered in the United States may be registered, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, on application of the publishers thereof or their agents, and when so registered, and not otherwise, may be transmitted through the mails at the same rates as if published in the United States.

SEC. 19. That the certificate of registration issued under the provisions of section 13 shall substantially be in the following form, namely:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, ——, 18—.

The ——, (name of publication,) published at ——, having been submitted to this office for examination, under the provisions of section 13 of the act of —— ——, ——, has been examined and found to be within the intendment of section 17 of the same act.

This certificate of registration is therefore this day issued to —— ——, which is hereby entitled to be transmitted through the mails, when properly prepaid and sent from the regular office of publication, or from a news agency to regular subscribers at the rate of two cents for each pound or fraction thereof, for —— months from this date, unless sooner revoked.

—— ——,
Postmaster.

SEC. 20. That publishers of registered matter of the second class may, without subjecting it to extra postage, fold within their regular issues a supplement; but in all cases the added matter must be germane to the publication which it supplements, that is to say, matter supplied in order to complete that to which it is added or supplemented, but omitted from the regular issue for want of space, time, or greater convenience, which supplement must in every case be issued with the publication.

SEC. 21. That on all mail matter of the third class, including books, transient newspapers, and periodicals, circulars, and other matter wholly in print, (not included in section 12,) proof-sheets, corrected proof-sheets, and manuscript copy accompanying the same, postage shall be paid at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall fully be prepaid by postage-stamps affixed to said matter. All books admitted to the mails for conveyance therein under the provisions of the postal union treaty may be delivered free of any customs duty, under such regulations as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 22. That the term "circular" is defined to be a printed letter, which, according to internal evidence, is being sent in identical terms to several persons. A circular shall not lose its character as such when the date and the name of the addressed and of the sender shall be therein written, nor by the correction of mere typographical errors in writing.

SEC. 23. That "printed matter" within the intendment of this act is defined to be the reproduction upon paper, by any process except that of handwriting, of any words, letters, characters, figures, or images, or of any combination thereof.

SEC. 24. That mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class, which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail-bag, or harm the person of any one engaged in the postal service, and is not above the weight provided by law, which is hereby declared to be not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, except for books and documents published or circulated by order of Congress, or official matter emanating from any of the Departments of the Government, or from the Smithsonian Institution, or which is not declared non-mailable under the provision of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of July 12, 1876, or matter appertaining to lotteries, gift concerts, or fraudulent schemes or devices.

SEC. 25. That all matter of the fourth class shall be subject to examination and to a postage charge at the rate of one cent an ounce or fraction thereof, to be prepaid by stamps affixed. If any matter excluded from the mails by the preceding section of this act, except that declared non-mailable by section 3893 of the Revised Statutes as amended, shall by inadvertence reach the office of destination, the same shall be delivered in accordance with its address: Provided, That the party addressed shall furnish the name and address of the sender to the postmaster at the office of delivery, who shall immediately report the facts to the Postmaster-General. If the person addressed refuse to give the required information the postmaster shall hold the package subject to the order of the Postmaster-General. All matter declared non-mailable by section 3893 of the Revised Statutes as amended, which shall reach the office of delivery, shall be held by the postmaster at the said office subject to the order of the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 26. That mailable matter of the second class shall contain no writing, print, mark, or sign thereon or therein in addition to the original print, except as herein provided, to wit, the name and address of the person to whom the matter shall be sent, and index-figures of subscription-book, either written or printed, the printed title of the publication, the printed name and address of the publisher or sender of the same, and written or printed words or figures, or both, indicating the date on which the subscription to such matter will end. Upon matter of the third class, or upon the wrapper inclosing the same, the sender may write his own name or address thereon, with the word "from" above and preceding the same, and in either case may make simple marks intended to designate a word or passage of the text to which it is desired to call attention. There may be placed upon the cover or blank leaves of any book or of any printed matter of the third class a simple manuscript dedication or inscription that does not partake of the nature of a personal correspondence. Upon any package of matter of the fourth class the sender may write or print his own name and address, preceded by the word "from," and there may also be written or printed the number and names of the articles inclosed; and the sender thereof may write or print upon any such articles a mark, number, or letter for purpose of identification.

SEC. 27. That matter of the second, third or fourth class containing any writing or printing other than indicated in the preceding section, or made in the manner other than therein indicated, shall not be delivered except upon the payment of postage for matter of the first class, deducting therefrom any amount which may have been prepaid by stamps affixed to such matter; and any person who shall conceal or inclose any matter of a higher class in that of a lower class, and deposit, or cause the same to be deposited, for conveyance by mail, at a less rate than would be charged for both such higher and lower class matter, shall, for every such offense, be liable to a penalty of $10. Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent publishers and dealers in registered matter of the second class from inclosing, in their publications, bills, receipts, and orders for subscription thereto; but such bills, receipts, and orders shall be in such form as to convey no other information than the name, location, and subscription price of the publication or publications to which they refer.

SEC. 28. That the Postmaster-General may prescribe, by regulation, the manner of wrapping and securing for the mails all packages of matter not charged with first-class postage, so that the contents of such packages may be easily withdrawn for examination from the wrappers or envelopes thereof without breaking or destroying such wrappers or envelopes; and no package not lawfully packed, and the contents of which cannot be easily withdrawn for examination in consequence of being sealed by gum, wafer, sealing-wax, or otherwise, shall pass in the mails, or be delivered at a less rate than for matter of the first class.

SEC. 29. That publications registered under the provisions of section 13 of this act, one copy to each actual subscriber residing in the county where the same are printed, in whole or in part, and published, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier offices, or distributed by carriers, unless postage is paid thereon at the rate prescribed in section 13 of this act: Provided, That the rate of postage on newspapers, excepting weeklies, and periodicals not exceeding two ounces in weight, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by the office or its carriers, shall be uniform at one cent each; periodicals weighing more than two ounces shall be subject to a postage of two cents each, and these rates shall be prepaid by stamps affixed.

SEC. 30. That all matter of the first class deposited for mailing on which more than one full rate of postage is required, but which has been prepaid by but one full rate, may be held until such additional postage due is prepaid when the sender of the same is known to the postmaster; but when such sender is not known such matter shall be forwarded to its destination, charged with the unpaid rate, to be collected on delivery.

SEC. 31. That the Postmaster-General, in order to secure certainty and uniformity in the construction of this act, and to confine the decision of all questions of its construction to one office, may detail a competent employé of the Post-Office Department to assist the Assistant Attorney-General for that Department, who shall receive and be entitled to a salary of $2,250 per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment comprising sections 9 to 31, inclusive, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read sections 32, 33, and 34, as follows:

SEC. 32. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to take the necessary steps to introduce and furnish for public use a letter-sheet envelope, on which postage-stamps of the denominations now in use on ordinary envelopes shall be placed. And the Postmaster-General is also authorized to introduce and furnish for public use a double postal card, on which shall be placed two one-cent stamps, and said card to be so arranged for the address that it may be forwarded and returned, said cards to be sold for two cents apiece; and also to introduce and furnish for public use a double-letter envelope, on which stamps of the denominations now in use may be placed, and with the arrangement for the address similar to the double postal card; said letter-sheet and double postal card and double envelope to be issued under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the Government in introducing said letter-sheet, double envelope, and double postal card.

SEC. 33. That section 9 of an act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," is hereby repealed.

SEC. 34. That any person who shall use or attempt to use in payment of postage any canceled postage-stamp or postage-stamps, whether the same have been before used or not, or who shall by any means remove, or attempt to remove, or assist in removing, marks from any postage-stamp or postage-stamps, with intent to use the same in payment of postage, or who shall have in his possession any postage-stamp or postage-stamps canceled, or from which such cancellation marks have been removed, or who shall sell or offer to sell any such stamp or stamps, or who shall use or attempt to use the same in payment of postage, or who shall remove the superscription from any stamped envelope or postal card that has once been used in the payment of postage, with intent to again use the same for a like purpose, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than one year, or by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 for each offense, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. FERRY. In line 8 of section 34 I move to insert "with intent to use the same."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, no objection being interposed.

The Secretary read sections 35, 36, and 37, as follows:

SEC. 35. The provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-routes, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, be, and they are hereby, extended to all officers of the United States Government, and made applicable to all official mail matter transmitted between any of the officers of the United States, or between any such officer and either of the Executive Departments or officers of the Government, the envelopes of such matter in all cases to bear appropriate indorsements containing the proper designation of the office from which the same is transmitted, with a statement of the penalty for their misuse. And the provisions of said fifth and sixth sections are hereby likewise extended and made applicable to all official mail matter sent from the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That this act shall not extend or apply to pension-agents or other officers who receive a fixed allowance as compensation for their services, including expenses for postage.

SEC. 36. That section 3955 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended, so as to read as follows: "The Postmaster-General, whenever he may deem it consistent with the public interest, may accept or require new surety upon any contract existing or hereafter made for carrying the mails, in substitution for and release of any existing surety."

SEC. 37. Any person performing the duties of postmaster by authority of the Postmaster-General at any post-office where there is a vacancy for any cause shall receive for the term for which the duty is performed the same compensation to which he would have been entitled if regularly appointed postmaster; and all services heretofore rendered in like cases shall be paid for under this provision.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the vote be taken on these sections.

Mr. KERNAN. The sections just read are one subject. Beginning with section 38, we come to a new class, and they should be voted on separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put as one amendment sections 32 to 37, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. Before going further I ask that on page 15 a correction be made. On line 336, "Newton's" should be stricken out and "Newland's" restored. I find on consultation that "Newland's" is right, and on line 357 I move to strike out "Harlem" and insert "Harlan."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be made.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit the following as a new section, to come in after section 37:

SEC. —. That the President and Vice-President of the United States, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, may send or receive free, through the mails, written or printed communications not exceeding two ounces in weight; and the name the President, the Vice-President, and of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, or Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be written on letters or communications which they shall respectively send through the mails.

I will say that is a precise transcript of an amendment which I offered to another bill, and which was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. If I understand, this is an amendment to restore the franking privilege to members and Senators on letters and all written matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unlimited.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope we shall not do that.

Mr. GORDON. It is limited.

Mr. KERNAN. I know it is limited to two ounces; but we shall soon enlarge it if we begin. We are now permitted to frank all matter printed by Congress that we desire to send, and I suppose ought to send, to the people; but if we restore this unlimited franking privilege to Members and Senators, there will be, I think, justly great complaint. I think it should not be done. I remember that there were abuses before that made it very unpopular, and they will grow up again. I think we should pay postage like others on our letters and on all matter except the public printed documents; and I hope the amendment may not be adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I fully concur with the Senator from New York. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted, and upon its passage I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think, Mr. President, that more than nine out of every ten letters which Senators and Representatives receive are on public business, and I fail to discover any difference in the equity of allowing to go free a communication relating to public business whether it comes to me or goes to the head of a Department. I can see none; I believe there is none. The portion of our correspondence which may be of a family or a social character is so very limited and it would be so very troublesome for the Senator or Representative to distinguish between the two that I have ignored all that. The amendment puts the law back and limits it to two ounces, precisely where it was under the old law. You have restored the worst part of the old law; you have encouraged printing books here by the hundreds of thousands, sending them off by the cord and ton. Where all the evil existed before you have put it back, and you have left that which was least objectionable behind. I wish to restore it; and this being a transcript of the amendment which I offered the other day, and which was adopted by the Senate by a vote of more than two to one, I trust Senators will not be so inconsistent as to reject it to-day.

Mr. KERNAN. I think we print too much. Very likely that charge is true. I am willing to deal with that question and cut down the printing. I cannot believe the cost is very much increased because the documents are sent to those who pay for the printing and who are our constituents, free; but in reference to the cost of our correspondence, we may say just what we please, there will be abuses that will give rise to scandal. I concur with the Senator from Maine that we cannot very well distinguish between the letters on private business and the public ones, but I think Members and Senators should pay for their letters and that we should not have the franking privilege as a sort of perquisite which does lead to abuse. We all know—and it is not a subject that I want to say a word about—the abuse there was in it before in sending a great deal, during the recess certainly, under frank, which was not the business of our constituents.

Mr. BLAINE. I never have voted to restore the franking privilege; I do not know that I shall now; but it is quite fair that we should know precisely how the matter stands. It was abolished by a very laborious effort which originated with the Post-Office Department under the honorable Mr. Creswell. It was then claimed that a very large amount would be saved to the Department, that there would be a great gain to its finances, if we should abolish the franking privilege. We were going to save a great deal on the transportation of the mails, and in various ways we were going to conduce to the revenues of the Department. Now, as my colleague has well said, every portion of the franking privilege which clogged the mail, and I will remark to the honorable Senator from New York almost all that part which led to abuse has been restored. If there was any point to be gained by abolishing the franking privilege, it was to stop the expensive and enormous printing of public documents. We have not stopped one. We began afterward by giving it out for a session or for ninety days after that we might frank, and we ended by making the franking privilege just as broad on all forms of public documents as it was before.

Mr. HAMLIN. And permanent.

Mr. BLAINE. And permanent, as my colleague says. It is just where it was in reference to public documents. Then we came back to the question of political speeches, and now we can publish and send broadcast under our frank anything that has got CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on it. Not only that, but you can take any extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and have it printed in Portsmouth or Galveston, or in any other place, and that is frankable, so that all the distribution that the Senator from New York refers to as occurring during congressional recesses politically is still open, is restored; the whole of it is in full force; all that remains is the correspondence. Practically let us see what that amounts to. I do not know whether my correspondence is larger or less than that of the average Senator or Representative, but I assume that it would be a very strong calculation to say that if you go through both branches of Congress there are thirty letters received and answered per day. My colleague says he thinks it would be so, taking every day in the year and not during the session merely. Take it every day in the year and I do not believe it will average fifteen. If you say thirty, it would make $100,000 a year that the Department saves.

So I merely rose to suggest that there was not such an enormous thing in this amendment now offered by my colleague. All that is mischievous, all that led to the abuses, all that led to weighing down the mails, has been restored and is in full force. All that superinduces and induces the printing of expensive public documents has been restored and is in full operation. I do not care about this proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, during the years that I have served in either House, I believe, until this session, I never lost an opportunity to vote against the franking privilege. While it existed I am sure I never omitted to vote for its abolition when an opportunity to give such a vote presented itself. I have heard a great many arguments made against the franking privilege, most of them exaggerated arguments, many of them resting upon allegations which I think were unfounded; but I am not sure that I ever heard an argument made against that part of the franking privilege which the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] proposes now to restore.

The argument on which the opponents of the franking privilege have rested has been indicated sufficiently by what Senators have said already to-day. The great argument was that it encouraged the purchase, the collection, and production of seeds which were sent over the country, many of which never came up; the publication, binding, and distribution of books, which were sent over the country, many of which were never read; and all of which seeds and all of which books ought not to be as part of the economy and practice and process of Government; and that because the franking privilege fostered all these and other things it ought to be cut off. That was the great, I may say the bulky, argument against the franking privilege.

Then, as has been said, we were shown all sorts of estimates to convince us how much would be saved to the Treasury and the Post-Office Department if an end was put to the whole practice. Very well; we abolished it, and as has been stated in respect of the matters to which I have referred already, the abolition has proved a total failure, utterly so. The fact that the franking privilege did not exist never stayed the tide of publication for an hour, that I can remember, in either House. The publication of books went right on, the distribution of seeds went right on, the production of cuttings and the various other things which were enumerated went on. But other things came. Stamps were to be furnished. Furnished to whom? To every official, high or low, down to the junior clerk in the remotest post-office; and he was to put on at his discretion these stamps and by their use send official letters. In the Departments the same thing was to be done. I am told by those who have explored the question more than I have that it has turned out to be anything but a money-saving process to print the stamps and provide the means for distributing them and keeping track of them.

But now—and it was to that point that I rose especially to say a word—it turns out that we may send through the mails such books like this for example, [indicating,] if they are congressional publications, weighing two or three pounds or whatever it may be. Look a moment at the effect of that. Some constituent writes to me; a great many do. There has been a great quickening of interest, it seems to me, during this past winter and spring in Congressional publications. I should say if I were going to testify that I have received more letters within the last eight or ten weeks asking me for public documents than I received during the whole session of Congress preceding this. I do not know why this is. I have inquired why it is of other Senators, if they could explain the fact that there seems to be a great revival just now of general interest in public documents. I receive letters asking me, for example, for Hayden's report, for the report of the Polaris expedition, and so on, the small number of which allotted to me were exhausted by the requisitions made upon them before the book ever appeared. If I have the book, I write my name upon it and send two or three pounds, five or six or seven hundred miles through the mail for nothing. I have not the book, and therefore I must sit down and write, as I do, to each one of the constituents who write to me a request for these books and many, many others which I have not, a letter, furnishing stationery, although I know we have an allowance of a hundred dollars for stationery and newspapers, or $75 perhaps—no matter what it is—I write the letter, perform the labor of doing that, and then must put on a three-cent postage-stamp, which I pay for myself, to go to this constituent, to carry to him the information that a constituent who is more diligent than he has obtained the book which he has written for, several weeks ago, and adding my regret that I cannot send it to him.

Now, Mr. President, is there anything more absurd than that? Is there anything more illogical than that a great budget may be sent free in reply to a letter in no wise concerning the Senator, or the Representative, brought to him by reason of his public station, but a note written on the smallest bit of the thinnest paper imposes upon him not only the labor of writing it but he must pay the full postage for sending it back? It seems to me that is very absurd.

I take one other case to illustrate, and I shall have done with this branch of the subject. A great number of soldiers, crippled, pensioned, the unfortunate connected with those who suffered in the war, write letters to me; I suppose to all other Senators. It is possible that I get a little more than my average share of such applications, because in the State which I have the honor in part to represent there are nearly five million people. Therefore I can understand, Mr. President, that it is quite possible I get more of this sort of applications than you get, for example, [Mr. ANTHONY in the chair]; but a very great number of them come to me. They frequently come with inadequate postage, one stamp or two stamps put on by those who sent them and who thought that was sufficient. They come to me marked "due twelve cents," "due fifteen cents," "due six cents," "due three cents," whatever the deficit may be. They contain requests that I send the papers inclosed farther on for some purpose to somebody. Suppose I send them only to a Department here, I must either get a page to carry them on purpose to the Department or I pay postage for that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Or go yourself.

Mr. CONKLING. Or go myself, as the honorable Senator remarks; and that reminds me of another thing I want to mention, but first I will attend to this. Suppose I return these papers to the sender for some purpose as frequently occurs, I am charged as an individual with the deficit of postage which occurred owing to his ignorance; and then I am charged with the postage which I pay back unless I put on three cents, enough to start it on its way rejoicing, and leave him to pay the residue. Is there any sense in that? Is there any reason, is there any propriety, in saying that the soldiers and sailors (I speak of them because they are a convenient class to take as an illustration, and we know how much business they have with Congress and the Department) should not send to their Senator and why their Senator should not answer them as much as a clerk in a Department would be allowed to do it? Certainly I can see none.

Take one other illustration, of which the Senator from Maine has just reminded me. Members of the Committee on Commerce who observe what I say, if any of them do, will remember a class of papers which in large numbers it is necessary to send especially to two of the Departments of the Government. It is my business as the chairman of the committee to transmit these papers. I pay all the postage myself out of my own pocket between the committee-room here and the Department in this city, or else I must go, as the Senator says, and carry the papers myself, or I must ask to have a page sent on purpose every time to carry these letters; and they go occasionally many times a day, continually go. When the papers come back from the Department some clerk who can be intrusted with stamps ad libitum better than a Senator can be intrusted, it seems, with the privilege of putting his autograph on a letter, puts on his stamp and they come back. There is no difficulty about the return trip; but when they are to be sent from the Capitol in order that a Senator may get information about a piece of legislation, the particular Senator who happens to be the organ of the committee through an entire session is to pay postage on all those letters.

Mr. President, I have heard of a case not very ancient, yet under the present condition of the law, in which a Senator who kept an account of the postage he paid himself for one week, or the clerk of his committee did, paid $9 postage in a single week, counting nothing that he paid on documents. Is there any sense in it? There used to be sense in denouncing the franking privilege, I thought. I supposed there was some sense in the vote I gave when I voted in innumerable instances to put an end to it. I supposed it was to put an end also to the publication of books, to the fabrication of documents and mail matter, to the distribution of seeds and cuttings and all that; but it has failed utterly in that respect; and now, as some Senator has said, any speech in pamphlet delivered here may be sent anywhere by simply having printed upon it "part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD." So that all books go, all speeches go, all documents go, all the clerks in all the public offices from one end of the country to the other have stamps furnished to them; but the members of the Senate and the members of the House, compelled as organs of committees and otherwise to communicate with other public agents and with their constituents, are required to pay postage.

Mr. President, I think I do not care for the amount of this postage which falls to my lot. I should not say I do not care. I do care. I do care probably in just such measure as a thing so comparatively small demands; but I meant rather to say that I have much more thought and much more care in regard to it when I think that every employé, every clerk, every agent everywhere, acting under laws which we ourselves make, is deemed the proper repositary and custodian of a power of this sort and a trust of this sort, and yet, as the law stands now, for a reason which I can found nowhere except in distrust of those who are omitted, the members of the two Houses, that particular class of public officers, are selected and vested with the necessity of contributing from their own money to pay for the transmission of correspondence.

Now, Mr. President, I say no; let us sweep the whole thing away; let us put an end to the real abuse and the real weight imposed upon the mails, or else let us go back and have the franking privilege as it was, limited to the ordinary weight of letters, and requiring, as this provision does, that the member shall write his name.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I voted a few days ago against restoring the franking privilege; I shall do so again; but I confess that the chief consideration which influences me in giving that vote is this: while am satisfied that no member of this body would be influenced by any consideration of advantage to himself in voting for the franking privilege on letters, yet, small as is the saving which a Senator would make by restoring the franking privilege, there are those throughout the country who would attribute the act of the Senator to personal considerations. In my judgment, it is the highest duty of this body to exempt itself from all suspicions, not only to avoid evil, but to abstain from all appearance of evil, so that the true character and dignity of this body may not be impeached for any cause, however trivial. Such a criticism upon the action of any member of this body would be a very unjust criticism; no Senator would cast his vote in favor of the franking privilege merely for the saving of a three-cent postage-stamp on the letters he might want to send away; but, as I say, trivial as that expense may be, there are those in the country who would make a clamor against the Senate and seek to degrade this body, which ought to be forever held in high estimation by the people of the country; because when the people of the country lose confidence in the integrity of Congress they will not respect the laws that are enacted by it.

It is for this reason, and this reason alone, that I oppose the proposition. The saving to the Department by refusing the franking privilege upon letters, I conceive to be a mere trifle; it is a matter that perhaps ought not to enter into the calculation; but the matter I have named is one of importance to every one, and I feel that it ought to control my action. For that reason I shall vote against the restoration of the franking privilege on letters.

Mr. INGALLS. As the yeas and nays have been ordered on this proposition and I propose to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, I will take this occasion to say that franking is wrongly described as a privilege. It is not a privilege to the one who exercises it, but a burden. The privilege, if privilege there be, is one that belongs to the people, and not to the representatives. The people never demanded the abolition of franking. It was a device and a trick that was got up by certain economically minded officials for the purpose of carrying out a scheme that had long been entertained of making, as they called it, the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, as if any function of government was intended to be a source either of revenue or of profit to the people. You might as well talk about making the Army self-sustaining or the Navy self-sustaining, and putting the ships of war in the transportation and carrying trade, when they are not engaged in armaments, in taking potatoes and hoop-poles up and down the coast, or setting the Army to the work of cultivating the arid and unoccupied public domain, as to attempt to make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. Its object is to furnish the people with information, and to allow them to receive from their representatives statistics, data, and information as to what is being done here by those who represent them in the different departments of the Government.

As has been said, the worst part of franking has been restored. You can fill a sack with books that it will require the joint labors of two men to carry out of this building, and have it transported for nothing to San Francisco, or Sitka, or Galveston, or anywhere upon the remotest frontiers of this country; but if you want to tell a man who writes you for that sack of books that your supply is exhausted, and send him a note to that effect, you have got to pay three cents to have it transported through the mails.

Senators and Representatives in the discharge of their functions here are engaged in public business. As an organ of one of the committees of this body, it is my duty, and I am brought into correspondence and communication with a vast number of people outside of my own State. There is not a mail that does not bring to me the cry from multitudes who think they are ready to perish, asking me in regard to their arrears of pension, in regard to the condition of particular bills before Congress, and matters before the Departments. I am compelled in many cases to pay, simply because I am chairman of the Committee on Pensions, sums in excess of what has been placed upon the letters to secure their transportation. I am obliged to answer those letters day by day at great personal inconvenience. I transmit those answers to people who are not my constituents; they are in every State in this Union. What is the reason why, because I am discharging those public functions, I should be called upon to pay an excess of postage above what is allowed me for that purpose by law?

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to supplement a word right here?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is only expressing what is true of every other committee; there is no earthly difference, except one of degree; they are all alike.

Mr. INGALLS. I agree to that. Therefore, I say that the people themselves did not demand the abolition of this so-called privilege, and I believe they would be glad to have it restored. I have no doubt that a few newspapers, that are desirous of producing the impression that they are the particular champions of economy and reform and retrenchment, would find fault with a vote given for this amendment; but the present condition of affairs is illogical and absurd, and I am very glad of the opportunity, which I have exercised on previous occasions, to vote for the restoration of franking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I want to show by the figures I hold in my hand, from the last report of the Postmaster-General, how industriously the Departments have used the stamped envelopes furnished them, which are really the most convenient form of franking privilege that ever was invented for the use of man. To show how industriously they used them at the Departments, I find that there were used last year in the several Departments six hundred and fourteen thousand dollars' worth of one kind and four hundred and ten thousand dollars' worth of another kind.

Mr. INGALLS. That is their representative value?

Mr. BLAINE. Their representative value as postage-stamps; that is, if they had actually paid the postage represented by the letters they sent in envelopes of this kind it would have taken a million dollars. My impression is if they had been called upon, as the Representative or Senator is in his correspondence, to pay it all, the Post-Office Department would have been several thousand dollars short of the whole million that it received from this source.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the whole postal service?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. In other words, it is a very great abuse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 29; as follows:

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERRY. After line 809, at the close of "Minnesota," I move to insert among the routes:

From Marshall, via Rock Lake and Currant Lake, to Bear Lake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that section 38 be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 38. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish direct mail communication semi-monthly between the United States and the Empire of Brazil by means of two monthly lines of first-class sea-going steamships; the first of the said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New York, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, to touch at St. Thomas, Para, Pernambuco, and Bahia, both going and returning.

Mr. WITHERS. I move an amendment in line 8, after the word "at," to insert "Norfolk, Virginia;" so as to read:

In the United States and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, to touch at Norfolk, Virginia, St. Thomas, Para, Pernambuco, and Bahia, both going and returning.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he is prepared to state how much addition that will be to the distance and the detention of the trips?

Mr. WITHERS. It would be a very few miles addition to the distance, and I suppose not more than two hours of detention. As provision is made in the section as reported for the steamer which leaves New Orleans to touch at Galveston, involving several hundred miles additional distance, I think it is nothing but right to give Norfolk, Virginia, the most important port on the Atlantic coast south of Baltimore, the advantage of this trade to Brazil by permitting the steamers to touch at that port, involving the distance only from out of the capes to Norfolk and back again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the section will be concluded, and then the amendment will be received.

The Secretary read as follows:

The second of said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New Orleans, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching, both going and returning, at Galveston, and at such ports in the United States, the West Indies, and Brazil as the Postmaster-General may deem necessary and expedient; it being the true intent and meaning of this act that by the 1st day of January, 1879, service on both of said routes described in this section shall be established to make this act effectual as to either of them from and after that date.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that no vote be taken on the adoption of this section until after the next section is passed upon and agreed to. I can conceive very well that many Senators might be willing to vote for some sort of subsidy provided it was reasonable, but might not be willing to vote for the full amount proposed here. Therefore I suggest that this section shall be passed over until the other sections shall have been agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us consider them both at once.

Mr. FERRY. What would be the objection to considering the remaining sections together as they pertain to one subject, the establishment of lines between the United States and Brazil from different points in the United States to substantially the same points in Brazil?

Mr. MORRILL. Let the Secretary go on with the reading.

Mr. FERRY. Let the Secretary proceed with the reading and take the sections together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the end of the printed bill?

Mr. FERRY. To the end of the bill except the repealing clause, to section 45, including section 44.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be adopted if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and the reading will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 39. To establish said semi-monthly mail communication between the two countries, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to invite proposals for said mail steamship service by proper public advertisement in one newspaper published in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Boston, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder who shall possess the means to furnish the steamships required for the service, and who shall give good and responsible sureties for the faithful performance of the service under such contract. The two lines shall be contracted for separately, and each shall make monthly trips, that is to say, twelve round voyages per annum; the dates of departure of the steamships of the said two lines, from the cities of New York and New Orleans, to be regulated and determined by the Postmaster-General, so that said dates may be two weeks apart, as nearly as practicable: Provided, That separate contracts shall be made by the bidders for each of the two lines, and that the Postmaster-General sha'l not accept any bid in excess of $30 per mile per annum for each line for the distance between the termini of the routes respectively, which distance shall not be estimated nor paid for at more than five thousand miles for each of said routes. Said contract for each of said lines shall be for the term of ten years, to begin with each line from the day on which the first steamship, as above described, of said line, may depart from the city of New York or the city of New Orleans, with the mails, for Brazil; and the first departure of a steamship of the first line shall not be later than the 1st day of June, 1878, and the first departure of a steamship of the second line shall not be later than the 1st day of January, 1879.

Mr. MAXEY. In section 39, just read, I move in line 29 to strike out the word "June," and insert "July"——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has decided to take a vote on all the sections together. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 40. The steamships contracted for and furnished for said mail service shall be of not less than three thousand tons burden, American built and owned, and constructed of iron, after the best models, equipped with all modern improvements and approved appliances adapted for sea-going steamships of the first class, and shall be capable of making thirteen nautical miles per hour, and to be so constructed as to be readily adapted to the armed naval service of the United States in case of war; and before their acceptance by the Postmaster-General they shall be subject to inspection and survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, and whose report shall be made to the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 41. That the Government shall be entitled to have transported, with the fare and accommodation of a first-class passenger, free of expense, on each and every steamer of said two lines engaged in this service, a mail-agent to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodation for that purpose shall be given.

SEC. 42. That in case of failure from any cause to perform any of the regular monthly voyages stipulated for in the contracts, a pro rata reduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the performance of the service according to the contracts.

SEC. 43. The Postmaster-General shall have the power to determine the contract for either of said lines at any time such contract may be transferred, assigned, or underlet to any other party; and the said steamships shall at all times be subject to the use of the Government at reasonable rates of charter-party therefor.

SEC. 44. That the mail steamships employed in the service authorized by this act shall be exempt from all port charges and custom-house dues at the ports of arrival and departure in the United States: Provided, That a similar immunity from port charges and custom-house dues is granted by the government of Brazil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sections 38 to 44, inclusive, will be regarded as one amendment. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] proposes an amendment in the thirty-eighth section.

Mr. WITHERS. In the eighth line of that section, after the word "at," I move to insert "Norfolk, Virginia;" so as to read:

To touch at Norfolk, Virginia, St. Thomas, Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, both going and returning.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I now move, in line 29 of section 39, to strike out the word "June" and insert "July," and in line 32 to strike out the word "January" and insert "February;" so as to read:

And the first departure of a steamship of the first line shall not be later than the 1st day of July, 1878, and the first departure of a steamship of the second line shall not be later than the 1st day of February, 1879.

The months of June and January were fixed in a former bill, and both dates should be brought forward one month to make it correspond with the advance of time.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move to amend, in section 38, line 12, by inserting after the word "Galveston" the word "Pensacola;" so as to read:

The second of said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New Orleans, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching, both going and returning, at Galveston, Pensacola, and at such ports in the United States, the West Indies, and Brazil as the Postmaster-General may deem necessary and expedient.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to put the same question to the Senator from Florida that I did to the Senator from Virginia; that is, how much longer the distance would be for vessels making this point and how much additional time it would add to the trip time?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, very little.

Mr. FERRY. "Very little" is very indefinite. I should like to have the Senator, if he can, be specific.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, I might answer that question by asking the Senator from Michigan another. How far will Galveston be out of the way between New Orleans and those various ports of South America? The port of Pensacola is much nearer to New Orleans than the port of Galveston.

Mr. FERRY. I will answer that by saying that the trip time will not be increased much by touching at Galveston. It is so stated. I give the language of those who have some interest in the line. I now answer indirectly by putting a question to the Senator from Florida. I ask him what is the distance between Galveston and Pensacola?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know that I can state exactly the distance. It is about one hundred and eighty miles from New Orleans to Pensacola.

Mr. FERRY. And Pensacola is in the opposite direction going from New Orleans to Galveston?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, but it is nearer on the route to South America than Galveston.

Mr. FERRY. Leaving New Orleans for Brazil, touching at Galveston, the vessel would have to retrace its steps to go to Pensacola.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is true; but it might go east from New Orleans to Pensacola, and then go to Galveston.

Mr. FERRY. That would increase the distance one hundred and eighty miles. I leave it to the Senate to determine whether that would be practicable in establishing the line.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say that Pensacola is connected by rail with all the upper States of the Mississippi Valley. The great State of my friend from Kentucky is deeply interested in this proposition. There is a direct line of railroad running from Pensacola to Louisville. If there is any trade more profitable than another it is the trade to South America, and I should like to get an outlet for it at Pensacola. If the system is going to build up commerce, which I think it is, we should like to have Kentucky ship her provisions to the port of Pensacola and by this new steamship line to Brazil. Inasmuch as the committee is distributing benefits all around we should like to have a little of the benefit of the measure. I do not object to other ports, but we should like to have this a little more general. Galveston is designated, New Orleans is designated, Norfolk is designated, and I only propose to add what everybody knows to be the best harbor in the Gulf of Mexico, where there is no trouble in getting in or out, it being perfectly land-locked and protected, and it is an outlet for the great State of Missouri.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida whether there is any connection between the great wheat State of Kansas and Pensacola?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, we are connected with the whole nation, at Pensacola.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon, you are not connected with Oregon; I wish you were.

Mr. FERRY. The object of the measure is to secure a direct line between the United States and Brazil. The two terminal points in the United States are New York and New Orleans. New Orleans satisfies the West, the Mississippi Valley. In order to reach the great empire State of Texas it was thought best to touch at Galveston. To touch at Pensacola would be a zigzag course, increasing the distance, as stated by the Senator from Florida, one hundred and eighty miles. A better suggestion would be to touch at Havana, for there already is a mail service between Pensacola and Havana. I suppose the Senator from Florida does not design to defeat this measure. I hope he will not press his amendment; at least I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to say that there is already a line between Pensacola and Havana?

Mr. FERRY. It is but recently that the Postmaster-General with certain members of this body went on a trip between Florida and Havana to see that that line was properly established. I do not know that the Senator went himself.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That line is in the future. The present is within our power. We cannot control the future. I do not know that the Postmaster-General intends to establish it. We ought to have such a line as that. There is none now in existence. It is admitted on all hands that there is a fine harbor at Pensacola, which is an outlet to the whole of the fine country in our rear, not Florida alone, but Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, and all those States which lie in our rear.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that there is a mail service already between Cedar Keys, the termination of the railroad within the Gulf, and Havana.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would remind the Senator that that line, I am informed, has recently proved a failure. I am very sorry to say so. It is what was known as the fast-mail line.

Mr. FERRY. Then Florida must be a very unfortunate spot for a line to touch. If the proposition to touch at Pensacola is to cause a failure in this line, I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is no resemblance between the two measures. I am informed by the Post-Office Department that the railroads were not prepared to run the fast schedule necessary to maintain a tri-weekly line between Cedar Keys and Havana, and in consequence of that it is understood there that the line has failed. I believe those who had the contract to carry the mail by water were ready to go on, but the default was with the railroads. I do not know which line it was, but some one of them at least has proved a failure. That does not apply, however, to this case. Pensacola is the outlet for the States to which I have referred. There is no difficulty in getting in or getting out. It is a short distance to New Orleans. It is true if the steamers go to Galveston after leaving New Orleans it is some distance to go back to Pensacola, but inasmuch as this is, as I understand, a system to dispense commercial blessings and advantages to the people of the whole country, we want to get a little of them ourselves.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, this bill having come from the Post-Office Committee, of which I am a member, it is proper that I should say that I do not favor the proposition now before the Senate. I opposed it in committee, because I did not believe it was a matter which ought to be under the consideration of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. While it purports to be a measure to advance the postal interests of the country and is attached to a postal bill, it is very apparent from what has been already said in the discussion here that the postal interests form the last element which entered into the consideration of the committee or which will enter into the consideration of the Senate in determining this question. It professes to be a postal measure. I should like to know from any member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads what recommendation this measure has from the Post-Office Department. What necessity has ever been communicated to the committee from the Post-Office Department that such a measure is necessary for the postal interests of this country? We had before us at the time the express declaration of the Postmaster-General that he could not recommend this measure as necessary to the postal service. I have his letter here, directed to the chairman of that committee, of January 30, in response to an inquiry made by the chairman of the Postmaster-General in reference to the propriety of the adoption by the committee of the bill which was referred to the committee on this subject, and I beg leave to read what the Postmaster-General said in reference to the necessity of this matter. The Postmaster-General said:

> With reference to Senate bills Nos. 275 and 442, inclosed herewith, authorizing the establishment of mail-steamship service to foreign countries, handed by you to the First Assistant Postmaster-General with a request for an expression of the views of this Department relative to the legislation therein proposed, I have the honor to inform you that as the steamship lines proposed to be established under these and similar bills pending before Congress are chiefly important to the country as means of establishing and developing commerce with foreign countries, and only incidentally useful as means of mail communication, I do not feel justified in recommending to Congress, as a postal measure, the granting of special subsidies in aid of such lines in excess of the payments authorized under existing laws for the transportation of the mail to foreign countries.

That is the Postmaster-General's letter addressed to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee in reference to a bill to subsidize a line from New York to Brazil. Subsequently another letter was received, April 29, 1878, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in which the Postmaster-General says:

> SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry as to my opinion of the merits of the provisions of the bill, a copy of which you handed me, entitled "A bill to provide ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil," I have the honor to refer you to a letter I addressed you, dated January 30, 1878.

Which is the letter I have just read—

> In that letter I stated that steamship lines such as the one contemplated by this bill "are chiefly important to the country as means of establishing and developing commerce with foreign countries, and only incidentally useful as means of mail communication. I do not feel justified in recommending to Congress, as a postal measure, the granting of special subsidies in aid of such lines in excess of the payments authorized under existing laws for the transportation of the mail to foreign countries." To the opinion thus expressed I still adhere. Considered as a mere, naked postal measure I cannot commend this bill. I appreciate, however, the paramount importance of building up and fostering our trade with Brazil and the other South American States, and if Congress should appropriate moneys for the primary object of establishing and developing commerce with those States which would incidentally benefit the postal service by the encouragement of direct, regular and rapid lines of communication, and should trust the expenditures of the moneys so appropriated to this Department, as is done under the provisions of this bill, I am not prepared to oppose the measure or to advise against it. With such objects in view it becomes specially a subject for the judgment and action of Congress in its exercise of which I should cheerfully acquiesce.
> I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
>
> D. M. KEY,
> Postmaster-General.

The committee which reported this section as a postal measure had full advertisement from the Postmaster-General that in his judgment it was not necessary for the postal service, and that he could not commend it in that light; and yet it emanates from the committee as a postal measure. What is our postal communication with Brazil? What does it amount to? I do not know exactly the amount of revenue derived to the Government from the mails to Brazil, but I understand that the cost to the Government in the transmission of mails to Brazil in the last year was $1,200.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to interrupt him? I understand for the last three months we have been sending the mails to Rio by steamer at a cost of from $108 to $112 a trip.

Mr. PADDOCK. The mail is carried by a British line of steamers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There has been a regular line of steamers from New York to Brazil by which the mails of this country have been carried at a cost, as I before stated, in the last twelve months of about $1,200 per annum. And yet we propose in this section, as a postal measure, to pay $300,000 for the transmission of the mails to Brazil annually for the next ten years, when the present price for the transmission of the mails to that country has been but $1,200 in the last year! Well might the Postmaster-General, with his knowledge of all the facts in this case, with his knowledge of the very limited mail we have to that country, with his knowledge that we are transporting the mails of this country to Brazil for $1,200 a year, refuse to advise the adoption of a measure that would take out of the public Treasury $300,000 annually for a service which he could command and is commanding for $1,200 a year.

Mr. McPHERSON. How often do the steamers run?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Once a month. That line of steamers it is said is a British line of steamers sailing under a British flag. Suppose it is. It has always been the policy of this Government to send out its foreign mails at the cheapest rate it could, and by any line by which they could be promptly carried and delivered. Of course every citizen of this country would be glad to see the mails carried under our own flag provided it could be done as economically by the Government and with as much regularity as by other lines. But this has not been at all times possible heretofore. Our mails go now to England and to every part of Europe under the British and other foreign flags. We send, I suppose, by every line that goes to Europe, paying the regular sea postage to the lines that carry the mails.

Is it proposed to inaugurate the policy that the mails of this country shall only be carried under the American flag. Where is the country on the face of this earth that has refused or neglected to avail itself of every facility that offers for the transmission of its mail? Does not the British mail cross our continent on the Union Pacific and other railroads, and take the American steamers to Japan, to Australia, and China? Where is the country, I repeat, that acts upon the narrow policy that the mails of the country shall only be carried under its own flag, and that refuses the facilities which are offered by other countries, and limits the transportation of mails to its own bottoms upon the sea? When you say you desire the mails carried under our own flag and when the objection is made to transmitting them by a line that sails under a British flag, it may be an appeal to the patriotic sentiment of the country; but it is not an appeal which ought to have weight in the consideration of this question, if we look to the economy of the administration of the postal department and the interests of the people of this country. Would Senators who insist on sending the mails by American steamers be opposed to receiving, if they were in a foreign country, mail from friends at home because it came under a foreign flag, or would any one hesitate to send a letter if he had an opportunity at an earlier day under the British flag, and wait until he could send it by an American line? No, sir; that argument is thrown in I suppose to influence the feelings of persons in favor of this measure; but the policy it advocates is at variance with the practice of the Government heretofore, and is both impracticable and absurd.

But, Mr. President, having shown that there was no necessity for this measure, having shown that the Postmaster-General himself will not recommend it, I think that no argument can be advanced here in its favor founded upon the allegation that it is necessary for the transmission of the mails from this country to Brazil. We have already, as I before remarked, the Merchants' Line of steamers sailing from New York. There are three steamships sailing regularly from that city to Brazil. The committee in recommending this measure in its report says:

> The present methods of mail communication between this country and Brazil are discreditable to American enterprise and present a formidable hinderance to the enlargement of our trade with South America. There being no direct line of steamers, letters from this country destined for the Atlantic ports of South America below Pernambuco go first to Liverpool, three thousand miles, and thence five thousand miles, by the west coast of Africa, to Brazil.

I am sure that no member of the committee designed to say a thing that he did not think was true; but we have proof which I think must satisfy every one that the mails are not sent across the Atlantic to Liverpool, but they are sent direct from New York by regular steamers. Therefore I think that there is no member of this Senate who can vote for this proposition merely as a postal measure.

I shall not enter into any discussion as to the power of Congress to establish postal lines between here and Rio de Janeiro, because there being no necessity for the measure there is no occasion to discuss the power of Congress to aid in the establishment of steamship lines for the transmission of mails to that country. It will be useless and a waste of time to enter into any inquiry of the right of the Government to establish by the use of its money a line of communication between New York and Brazil merely for the purpose of carrying the mails of this country to Brazil. I remember that Mr. Monroe in one of his messages, in discussing the power of Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads, intimates very clearly that the power is simply a power to select from the lines already established. I shall not, however, enter into that question. If this question is commended at all, it is commended as a commercial measure, simply as a means of opening up the commerce of this country with Brazil. There is no other consideration, I am sure, that will be presented or that can be presented which will or ought to influence the vote of any Senator on this floor. Now, let us look at it in that light.

In the first place, there might be a question as to the power of Congress to appropriate money to establish steamship lines between this and foreign countries in aid of commerce. The power is given to Congress to regulate commerce, but I do not understand that that power includes the right to appropriate money out of the public Treasury for the purpose of building steamships or of aiding in the construction of steamships or of running steamship lines to foreign ports. It might be very interesting, if it were necessary, to recall some of the earlier views of the people of this country in reference to that commercial power. We all know that the interest which the people of this country felt in the regulation of commerce by the General Government gave rise to the union of these States, having led to the convention which adopted the Constitution.

The commercial convention which assembled at Annapolis, finding itself restricted and hampered by the resolutions under which it was confined, recommended a general convention with more ample powers, which gave rise to our present form of government. That convention originated from the fact that under the Articles of Confederation, prior to the adoption of our Constitution, the right of regulating commerce existed in the several States separately. In practice this was found very inconvenient. The regulations of one State were not adopted by those of another, and commerce was hindered and delayed by the various regulations made by the different States in reference to commerce in those States. It was that difficulty which gave rise to the convention that met at Annapolis, and ultimated in the convening of the convention which adopted the Constitution. It was because of that inconvenience which had been experienced that this power was given to Congress to regulate commerce, so that there might be uniformity in its regulation throughout the country.

What has been heretofore the rule held by this Government in reference to that power? So far as I understand there has been no view expressed by any commentator on the Constitution, certainly so far as I know there has been no decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which would justify the conclusion that the power to regulate commerce embraces the power to build steamships for the purpose of developing commerce or embraces the power to aid in the construction of steamships and the establishment of steamship lines for the purpose of developing the commerce of the country. It is a power to regulate commerce, not the power to build it up except as it should be incidentally built up under the regulations adopted by Congress for its government.

I intend that the remarks I make now shall be very brief, and without entering further into the discussion of the power of Congress to appropriate money as proposed in this section for the purpose of establishing commerce with Brazil, I inquire whether it will have the effect to enlarge and benefit our commerce. I hold not. We have already commerce with that country and sufficient means of transportation to do all the business of this country with Brazil. I have in my hands a memorial, which lies upon the desk, I suppose, of every Senator, signed by some twenty or thirty merchants of the city of Baltimore, protesting against the provisions of this section. I will read that memorial, because it will perhaps throw as much or more light upon the subject than anything I can say with reference to the necessity of this as a commercial measure.

The memorial says:

> The undersigned, merchants of Baltimore engaged in trade between this port and Brazil, would respectfully and earnestly remonstrate against the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate to provide for the establishment of steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil, and any similar bill granting subsidies to steamship lines between New York and Brazil and New Orleans and Brazil.
> The statement in the report of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, No. 366—

The report to which I referred and from which I read a few moments ago—> that "the passage of a steamer direct from the United States to Brazil is now unknown" is erroneous. The Merchants' line, consisting of the steamships Cassini, Glensannon, and Glenlogan, have been plying regularly between New York and Brazil for more than a year past, carrying the mails at a cost to the government of one-third of the ocean postage, being a little more than $1,200 per annum.

> Since the expiration of the subsidy to the Garrison line cable communication has been perfected with Brazil, and almost all the business between the two countries has been transacted by wire, making the mails of comparatively little value, except for the transmission of confirmatory advices and accounts.
>
> There are now some twenty firms engaged in this trade in Baltimore, the oldest of which has been in existence more than fifty years. There are thirty-two sailing-vessels plying regularly between Baltimore and Brazil, all of which were built in this country, are owned by American citizens, exporting American produce, and carrying the American flag, some of which have made the voyage between the ports of Baltimore and Rio de Janeiro in the short space of twenty-six days, while it is expected that the proposed steamship lines will make the voyage in twenty-five days, a difference scarcely appreciable.
> In addition to these facts, which we think show how unnecessary these particular subsidies are, we suggest that such special legislation is unfair and unjust, tending to build up one interest at the expense of others.

So that you see, Mr. President, that we have already vessels sailing from our ports under our own flag fully equal to the carrying on of all business with Brazil. There is no necessity, therefore, if the power to aid the establishment of this line existed under the Constitution in Congress, because every article which any man in this country desires to send to Brazil can now go by the lines that are already established.

There is a suggestion in this memorial to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, that the subsidizing of lines instead of aiding the commerce of the country will prove a hinderance and a detriment to the commerce of the country. The moment you subsidize a line, of course it will put down freights and drive all competition away. Has not that been the experience of the country in reference to all lines of transportation, whether upon land or upon sea? We know that these lines of transit from Baltimore, with a steamship line subsidized from New York, will be driven from the sea, because the steamship line established by the aid of the Government can, by the assistance of the subsidy which is granted to it, so reduce freights that merchants will be unable to send by these other lines, because necessarily they will have to charge the usual freight for transportation in order to exist. The moment you subsidize this line you give it virtually the monopoly of the carrying trade between New York and New Orleans and Brazil, and you drive away all competition. Thus, instead of proving a benefit to commerce, your subsidy will become an incubus upon the commercial business of the country, and will destroy that competition which is necessary to healthful, vigorous, and prosperous commerce.

Virtually this is, as I shall attempt to show hereafter, but a subsidy to John Roach. The moment you subsidize this line you destroy the ship-building of steamships by all other establishments. We have establishments for building steamships in the city of Wilmington, twelve miles from Mr. Roach's establishment, which are now engaged in building iron steamships; and you propose by this section to subsidize John Roach at the expense of Harlan & Hollingsworth, and at the expense of other establishments in the city of Wilmington only twelve miles distant. Some of the finest steamers in this country are built by Harlan & Hollingsworth, by Pusey, Jones & Co., and by other gentlemen engaged in that business in the city of Wilmington; but you propose by this section that Mr. Roach, who is engaged in building ships, shall have the advantage of a subsidy of $300,000 annually for ten years, so that he may be enabled to build ships at a lower rate than these other establishments can build them, and thus drive off not only competition in commerce but competition in the construction of steamships. The interests of the country and the interests of commerce are that steamship-building should be encouraged as far as possible, and equally at every point, and that there should be no favoritism granted to any, but that all builders of steamships should stand upon perfect equality, so that the competition may be as unrestricted and vigorous as possible.

I cannot conceive of an act more unjust than this would be to the gentlemen to whom I have referred, and I cannot consent to a measure of this kind when I know that the provisions of this measure are adapted exactly to the condition of Mr. Roach, and so framed that no one can be a competitor with him for the proposed subsidy. I could not consent to stand by and see this measure put into operation without at least expressing my views in opposition to it as a measure of great injustice to gentlemen in my own State engaged in the construction of iron steamships, as well as a measure injurious to commerce and unjust to the tax-payers of the country.

I have said that this measure was designed especially—I do not mean designed in an offensive sense—for John Roach. I mean that the provisions of this measure are so framed that Mr. Roach, and nobody else, can avail himself of the privileges conferred. That is what I mean. Now, what are the provisions of this section?

> That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish direct mail communication semi-monthly between the United States and the Empire of Brazil by means of two monthly lines of first-class sea-going steamships; the first of the said monthly lines of steamships to ply between the city of New York, in the United States, and the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, to touch at Saint Thomas, Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, both going and returning.

And then it provides that the tonnage of these vessels shall not be less than three thousand tons.

Such ships John Roach has to-day, and he has started them on the line from New York to Brazil; and he is constructing, according to his advertisement in the New York papers—one of which I had here a few days ago—steamers to run from New Orleans to Brazil of the same tonnage so as to be ready by the time fixed here for the starting of these vessels. So it was perfectly understood, I am sure that every member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads fully understood, when they reported this bill, that every provision of the bill was adapted to the accommodation of John Roach and that no other builder could possibly construct ships within the time limited, of the size and dimensions specified, to compete for the proposed service. Besides that, it was well known to the committee that John Roach himself had at the time the contract with the Brazilian government to run this line from New York to Brazil, for which he was to be paid by the Brazilian government.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He says it was understood that Mr. Roach has a contract with the Brazilian government by which he can get an amount of money for carrying the mails between Brazil and New York. Does that extend to the southern line from the port of New Orleans?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know about that. There is a subsidy I think of $100,000 or $120,000 from the Brazilian government exclusively for the line from New York to Brazil. I think the New Orleans matter has been originated in Congress, not by the Brazilian government. Mr. Roach, I say, has a contract already, and, in fulfillment of that contract, he has built one, if not two, I think two of the vessels, and one has already started in the month of May, and a second is to start on the 6th of June in fulfillment of this contract, so that he is now under special contract to run his line between New York and Brazil, and he comes to Congress and asks that Congress, out of the abundance of the American Treasury, shall give him a bonus in addition to what he has already been promised from the Brazilian government. Sir, is the Senate prepared to do that? If it is right at all to subsidize lines, are we prepared, when a line is already established and is already subsidized by a foreign government, to go into the Treasury of the United States and take from it the sum of $300,000 a year and give to the gentleman who has entered into that contract and who has perhaps been aided by merchants in New York and other capitalists? I do not know who is connected with him, but he secured the contract with the Brazilian government, and so far as I know Mr. Roach may himself own the line of steamers or he may have associated with him other gentlemen, capitalists of this country.

We have already tried lines of steamers between New York and Brazil. There was some years ago a subsidy, I believe, amounting for ten years to $3,000,000, paid to a line known as the Garrison line, between New York and Brazil. Did that line develop the commerce of the country, as it is claimed that this steamship line will develop it? It ran for ten years to secure the subsidy of the Government, and did secure the subsidy of the Government to the amount of $3,000,000. We heard no talk of any great development of the commerce of this country with Brazil under the operations of that line, and the fact was that the line at the end of the subsidy ceased to run the trips, because, I suppose, it could not longer induce the Government to take the public money and pay it to capitalists who were connected with that line. This is a proposition now to give $300,000 annually, amounting to $3,000,000 in ten years, to this company to run its line, when it is already under contract to run its line from New York—as far as I know it has no contract to run from New Orleans; but I see in the advertisement of the company that is running this line from New York that it is already constructing ships with a view of establishing a line between New Orleans and Brazil. So I have no question that the scheme here proposed will inure exclusively to the benefit of the company that is under contract with the Brazilian Government and is now asking for the bounty of this Government.

Mr. President, for one I shall not vote away the money of the people for any such purpose. If there is anything of which the people of this country have a right to complain it is the reckless manner in which their money has been squandered by appropriations of Congress. There never was a people, as I said a few days ago, on the face of this green earth whose resources have been so taxed as have been the resources of the people of this country for the last fifteen years. Why, sir, turn to the finance report—I have the financial report of 1873—and see what you have been drawing out of the people of this country. I have before me a statement of the expenditures of the United States from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1873, by calendar years and fiscal years. I find that in 1859 the gross amount of expenditures of the Government was $83,678,642.92; in 1860, $77,055,125.65; in 1861, $85,387,313.08; in 1862, $505,667,563.74; in 1863, $899,815,911.25; in 1864, $1,295,541,114.86; in 1865, $1,906,433,331.37; in 1866, $1,139,344,081.95; in 1867, $1,093,079,655.27; in 1868, $1,069,889,970.74; in 1869, $584,777,996.11; in 1870, $702,907,842.88; in 1871, $691,680,858.90; in 1872, $682,525,270.21, and in 1873, $524,044,597.91.

Such have been the expenditures of the Government. If you will turn to the receipts of the Government you will find that the ordinary receipts were such as perhaps no country on earth has within the same period of time or within the same number of years ever collected from any people. I will not stop to read them. They have been drawn from the resources of the people of this country, and now, when we are trying to get back to something like the former condition of affairs and reduce the expenses of this Government as far as possible, it is gravely proposed in this bill to take $300,000 annually for ten years out of the public Treasury and give it to an individual who is engaged in ship-building, as a subsidy, as a gratuity, for what service will he render? He will carry the mail. That is the only service he proposes to render and that service is already rendered to the Government for $1,200 a year. There never was a proposition in my opinion more outrageous, one that had less regard for the public interest, one that ought to be more firmly and emphatically resisted by the members of the Senate.

Sir, the people of this country have patiently paid all the taxes that they have been required to pay. During the war they thought the exigencies of the situation required it and they became accustomed to the payment of large taxes; but there is a restlessness on the subject now, and deservedly so. There ought to be dissatisfaction in regard to it; the people of this country ought to watch the action of their public servants, and whenever they see that a public man is unmindful of their interests, they ought to dismiss him from their service just as any man would dismiss his steward or his agent, who was unfaithful to his trust. I wish a sentiment throughout the length and breadth of this land could be inaugurated that would induce the people of this country to watch with vigilance and with care the action of the members of Congress in reference to the appropriations of the public money, and I wish everywhere the sentiment would prevail that a man who has squandered uselessly in subsidies to private corporations, or to private individuals, the public money should receive from the people he represents, and the State he represents, the dismissal which, in my opinion, he deserves. Until the people take this matter into their own hands and vindicate their own rights as they can by holding to a just responsibility their public servants, their interests will never properly be cared for.

I have been too long in the Senate and have watched with too much interest the reckless squandering of the public money to be indifferent to it. I can do no more than simply cast my own vote in opposition; but when this proposition is made to take the public money and give it to Mr. Roach or to Mr. anybody else as a gratuity, I feel impelled to raise my voice, as well as cast my vote, in protest against such a measure.

Mr. EUSTIS. Having introduced this bill which has been incorporated in the post-route bill, and having listened to a great deal of adverse criticism upon this measure——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Louisiana give way for a motion for an executive session?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the Senator from Vermont makes that motion, will he allow me to say that I think the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, who is now out of his seat, will ask the Senate to conclude this bill to-morrow.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Vermont will delay his motion until the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill returns to the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is presumed to be here. It is said that he wishes it ended to-morrow. That is all right.

Mr. FERRY. Am I to understand a motion is made to go into executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is pending.

Mr. FERRY. I find that there are several Senators disposed to discuss this question of the mail service between the United States and Brazil, and I am not willing to keep the Senate here late to-day unless they are disposed to sit it out. As I judge that that is not the disposition of the Senate, I merely give notice that I shall press a vote on this bill to-morrow.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if it would be in order to move for a recess until half past seven this evening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not pending this motion. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WOOD. As the bill relates to bonds of the United States it ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CULBERSON. I prefer that it should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WOOD. I have no objection to that reference at this stage of the session; but the bill evidently belongs to the committee which has charge of the payment of the Government bonds and interest thereon, the Committee of Ways and Means.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. Mr. EDEN and Mr. CONGER reserved all points of order upon the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that on Wednesday next I shall endeavor to get the House to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election be authorized to have printed from time to time for the use of the committee and the House the testimony taken by said committee.

Mr. CONGER. If it includes all the testimony, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. Of course it includes all.

Mr. CONGER. Then say "all the testimony."

Mr. MORRISON. It means that, and says so.

The SPEAKER. "The" testimony means "all."

Mr. CONGER. It does not say "the testimony;" it says "testimony."

Mr. MORRISON. It does say "the testimony."

Mr. CONGER. It was not read so by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. It will be read again.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be modified so as to provide for printing "all the testimony."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] accept that suggestion?

Mr. MORRISON. That is a mere whim; the resolution means that now.

Mr. CONGER. If that is not put in I must object to the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. Put in anything you want; you will get all you want before it is done, probably.

The resolution was modified accordingly, and, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GALVESTON HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 134, making further appropriations for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas, and that it be now considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill appropriates the sum of $75,000 for the purpose of continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, in the State of Texas, which improvements are now being prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the appropriation for which is substantially exhausted, and that the said $75,000 be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. EDEN. Was there not an appropriation for this harbor made in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. GIDDINGS. This is to be deducted.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is nothing in this bill that will require the amount to be deducted from that appropriation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is to be deducted.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senate committee has reported an amendment to the river and harbor bill reducing the item for Galveston Harbor $75,000, because this bill had passed the Senate. If this bill shall also pass the House the river and harbor bill will be amended accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that agreement is carried out, it will be all right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a letter from the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] distinctly affirming that arrangement.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I now ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday last.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make a report.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is not first in order on the list. The Chair will recognize him when his name is reached.

Mr. BLAND. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. FORT. I wish to make a report from a committee. It will take but a moment.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the Chair will recognize me to call up the unfinished business, being the bill on which the House was engaged last Saturday——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to test the sense of the House upon that, because it is a public bill, in course of consideration, and strictly within the rules.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the internal-revenue bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it in order for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to make such a motion now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOOKER. This is the day for moving a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] makes that motion.

Mr. HOOKER. Does he stand first on the list to make such a motion?

The SPEAKER. He moves to suspend the rules for the consideration of a public bill. The Chair has frequently stated that he would recognize such a motion on Monday, simply informing the member making the motion that it requires a two-third vote to carry it. It is upon the principle that public business should be considered in preference to private business.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Other gentlemen have matters of public business which they would like to bring up on motions to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. This bill is unfinished business, which gives it an additional claim.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURCHARD, there were—ayes 159, noes 17.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

The House accordingly resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore,) the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 6. That whenever, under the provisions of section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, an assessment shall have been made against a distiller for a deficiency in not producing 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery as established by law, or for the tax upon the spirits that should have been produced from the grain or molasses found to have been used in excess of the capacity of his distillery for any month, as estimated according to law, such excessive use of grain or molasses having arisen from a failure on the part of the distiller to maintain the capacity required by law to enable him to use such grain or molasses without incurring liability to such assessment, and it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that said deficiency, or that said failure, whereby such excessive use of grain arose, was not occasioned by any want of diligence or by any fraudulent purpose on the part of the distiller, but from misunderstanding as to the requirements of the law and regulations in that respect, then, and in such case, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized, on appeal made to him, to remit or refund such tax, or such part thereof as shall appear to him to be equitable and just in the premises: Provided, That no tax shall be remitted or refunded under the provisions of this section upon any assessment heretofore made for material used in excess of capacity prior to the 6th day of September, 1875, nor upon any assessment, whenever made, for any such deficiency which has heretofore occurred.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I move to amend by adding to this section the following:

Provided further, That no arrearages shall be charged against any distiller of fruit for any failure to maintain the required capacity, unless the Commissioner shall, within twenty days after the date of each monthly report, notify such distiller of such failure so to maintain the required capacity.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the gentleman will explain the object of this amendment.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Any one familiar with the mode of proceeding in regard to these reports will understand that in various cases which have arisen distillers, after making their monthly reports and winding up their business, have had their accounts overhauled at the Department and have been compelled at the end of two or three years to pay arrearages of which they had had no notice. The object of the amendment is to protect the distiller from such claims for arrearages unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall within twenty days after the monthly report notify the distiller that he is failing to maintain the required capacity.

I think that the section as reported is intended in part to provide for the evil of which I complain; but it does not fully do so. I think it is absolutely wrong, when a distiller has sold the proceeds of his still and wound up his business, for the Department after a period of two or three years to charge him with these arrearages of which he has had no notice.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to some limitation of this kind; but I think twenty days would be too short a period.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I will accept a month.

Mr. BURCHARD. No, I think a month would be too short.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. What time would the gentleman think sufficient?

Mr. BURCHARD. I would say six months.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. That is entirely too long. I will compromise with the gentleman by saying three months.

Mr. BURCHARD. Very well.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Three months will surely be long enough.

Mr. BURCHARD. In any shorter time than three months the necessary examinations might not be made at the Department.

The amendment, as modified by striking out "twenty days" and inserting "three months," was read.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that the amendment be further modified by inserting "receipt" instead of "date."

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I have no objection to making that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois, in charge of the bill if he would have any objection, in line 27, to striking out "75" and inserting "74;" so it will read:

That no tax shall be remitted or refunded under the provisions of this section upon any assessment heretofore made for material used in excess of capacity prior to the 6th day of September, 1874.

Mr. BURCHARD. The object of fixing the date the 6th of September, 1875, was to cover cases where the order was made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to the use of the excess of material over the capacity of the distillery. Those cases were recommended for relief by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as will be seen by examination of his annual report. On examination of the facts the committee were of the opinion that relief should be granted, but that it should not open up all cases where there had been a deficiency of excess above the capacity prior to that time through the fault perhaps of the distiller. In the cases included here it was the fault of the office itself, and therefore it is only right to grant relief.

Mr. BANNING. I move to strike out the words that I have indicated, and I do it for the reason that if it is proper to relieve persons since that time it would be equally proper to relieve persons prior to that time, and I hope gentlemen will not object to striking the words out.

Mr. HANNA. I move to amend by striking out "6th day of September" and inserting "the 1st day of January, 1875;" so it will read "the 1st day of January, 1875;" and I will state briefly my reason for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not an amendment to the amendment, but an amendment to the original text of the bill, and is not now in order, but will be in order after the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is disposed of. The first question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURCHARD. The object of the amendment in the bill is explained in the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on page 41, which I ask the Clerk to read. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to include cases having no relation to those provided for in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 6th of September, 1875, after much careful consideration, Hon. D. D. Pratt, then Commissioner, issued circular No. 165, concerning the method of determining the quantity of grain actually used by a distiller. The matter under consideration was the proper construction to be given to the word "used" in section 3309 of the United States Revised Statutes, and said circular was based upon the idea that the proper construction of that word was that the material was to be considered used, not when it was mashed, but when alcoholic spirits, having been properly developed, were separated therefrom by distillation; and for the purpose of giving force to this construction, distillers were required to make return of the quantity of grain or molasses, in bushels and pounds or gallons, on hand in mash at the beginning of the month, to which was to be added that put into mash during the month, and from this total was to be deducted the quantity on hand in mash at the end of the month, the remainder being the quantity shown to be used during the month. After this regulation went into effect a number of distillers throughout the country, in due course of operating their distilleries, found it necessary to reduce the capacity of their distilleries, and, in doing so, omitted to maintain a sufficient amount of daily fermenting capacity to equal the quantity of beer to be distilled that was fermented on the days immediately prior to the date of the change of capacity, so that at the end of the month, when the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under section 3309, proceeded to inquire and determine whether the distiller had accounted for all the grain or molasses used, it was discovered that the sum of the different daily capacities of the distillery for the several working days of the month was not equal to the sum of the various quantities distilled on the several working days of the month, so that a quantity of material had been used in excess of the total capacity of the distillery. In such cases assessments were made for an excessive use of material under the provisions of said section 3309.

Abatement claims have been filed in these cases, and I have endeavored to give the subject very careful consideration. The distillers might have avoided the assessments by simply omitting to mash a quantity of grain equal to the proposed reduction of capacity from day to day during a fermenting period, retaining their surveyed capacity, so that they might lawfully distill the full amount of material previously fermented by them, and then, at the end of said fermenting period, they might have reduced the capacity of their distilleries to the amount of the reduced quantity of grain daily mashed by them, but, instead of doing this, an immediate reduction of capacity was made, with the result named.

I regard the payment of these assessments as a great hardship upon the distillers, and, if I had found warrant of law for doing so, I would have abated them; but I have felt constrained to hold, and have held, that where a tax is legally assessed I could not, under the provisions of section 3220, take equitable jurisdiction of the case and remit it. I have authorized collectors to delay the collection of these assessments until the matter could be presented fairly to the consideration of Congress. At the last session of Congress a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, numbered 4630, the second section of which made provision to remit and refund assessments of this character. I have the honor to respectfully recommend that an act similar in terms to said section be passed by the present Congress.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to support the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, although it reaches a little further back than would subserve the interest of parties in interest in my district. I take it the true rule is to require the Government to collect tax on the actual number of gallons of whisky made; and in any case where, upon incorrect estimate, the Government collects more tax than actual gallons made, the parties ought to have relief. I have a case in my own district, which occurred between the 1st of January, 1875, and the 6th day of September, where there was an absence of fraud, where the party, if the old law was enforced, would be required to pay more money than the Government would be entitled to upon the actual number of gallons of whisky distilled. It does seem to me to be nothing but right and just that the Government should not seek to cover with tax more than the number of gallons manufactured on any single day. The only difference between the amendment of my friend from Ohio and mine is this: the amendment I sought to make would fix the 1st of January, 1875, while his fixes the 6th day of September, 1874. If a case reaching back to the 6th of September, 1874, stands upon the same footing as a case in 1875, where the party did not manufacture the whisky the Government is seeking to cover with tax, it does seem to me only right and proper the party should have relief.

In the case I have in my own mind from my own district I have forborne thus far to offer a bill for private relief, hoping when we come to consider this general bill relief would be furnished certainly to go back to the 1st of January, 1875, or the 6th of September, 1874. Where a meritorious case is presented to the Government where there is an absence of fraud it is nothing but right and just the party should have relief where they have paid tax on a false basis or where they have a case pending in which they are praying for relief. The case I have in my own mind is where a case was pending before the Commissioner for relief and the answer of the Commissioner was, under no existing law could he give relief. So I shall be driven either to report a private bill or have this bill so amended that relief could be furnished. I stand myself on the general principle that going back to the 1st of January, 1875, is not going back too far—is not opening the door for the readjustment of matters which it is claimed are settled, for the reason those cases are not settled.

There are cases pending before the Commissioner where the parties are praying for relief, and I think it would be just and right between the Government and the citizen in that class of cases that this law, general in its provisions, should meet all these special cases.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] why he limits the time at all. One of my constituents has been thus fleeced of several hundred dollars before the time mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio; and I do not see why, when the Government has collected money from any citizen, and confesses it was wrongly collected, it should not pay that back without regard to time. I trust my colleague will consent to an amendment that will allow any money to be paid back which has been wrongly collected since this order was made. I think in equity we should do that.

As the law now is, nobody can blame any distiller for being dishonest. He is compelled to be dishonest to make his accounts balance at the end of the year; because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue admitted to me this was robbing men of money that they had no right to pay, but he was not authorized under the law to return it. Now how can you expect citizens to be honest when the Government treats them in that way? He said to me: "The money has been collected from your constituent and he has paid all the taxes the Government requires, but I am helpless under the law and cannot refund the tax." I say this great Government should not attempt to rob its citizens in any such manner as that. I hope the section will be amended so as to apply to all cases, going back as far as the time when this order was originally made.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to oppose the amendment. This section I regard as one of the best remedial sections in the bill. One way of ascertaining the amount of tax to be paid by the distiller to the Government is to take his report of the amount and the report also by the officers of the amount actually produced. In some countries the tax is assessed on the distillery simply according to its capacity, without regard to production. The distillery is licensed and pays a tax according to its capacity. Now our system combines the two methods. We take the actual production and we also take the capacity and require the distiller to produce 80 per cent. of that and to pay the tax on 80 per cent. of the capacity, whether he produces it or not. That has been the law and there has been no relief whatever. His only remedy, if he failed to produce 80 per cent., was to come to Congress for relief.

We propose by this section to give the Commissioner power in certain cases to relieve where there is a failure to produce the 80 per cent. of the capacity or where the distiller has used grain or molasses in excess of the capacity. We propose to authorize the Commissioner to give relief in those cases where the failure does not occur through the fault or negligence of the distiller, but has occurred as the result of an unavoidable accident. That we make the general law for the future. That was proposed by the committee having this matter in charge; but the Commissioner recommended in his report that, in addition to a provision for the future which we had agreed upon, we should relieve these cases where there had been assessment for the excess of the capacity over the amount actually produced. We put in, therefore, a proviso giving relief for the past in cases which had occurred under that order and where the money had been actually paid into the Treasury on assessments that have been made in the past. We do not think that money should be refunded or paid back, because that has been the law for the last ten or twelve years. Personally I would have no objection to remove the limitation—it will refund to these men half a million dollars—if the House thinks it right to do that.

Mr. FORT. It does not amount to half a million dollars.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire only to explain what our purpose was, what the object of the limitation was and the extent to which it went.

Mr. FORT. There is no half million of dollars that ought to be refunded. But it is no reason for justice not being done that it is a large amount which is involved. This is no fault of the distiller at all. It is the fault of the order and the fault of the law. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue told me that the distiller could not help it. I move to strike out the whole proviso.

Mr. VANCE. That is correct.

Mr. BURCHARD. This proviso as we have worded it covers all the cases under the order to which my colleague refers. The order was made on the 6th of September, 1875. We go back to the date of that order. But as regards assessments and payments for a failure to produce the 80 per cent. capacity, those occurred under the law. The law said to the distiller, "You must produce 80 per cent."

Mr. FORT. But the law was wrong and the distiller could not help himself.

Mr. BURCHARD. It has been the law for ten years. That was one of the costs of producing the spirits; and we propose to make the law conform to the principle which I think is right as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] namely, that the distiller should pay on the amount actually produced and that the 80 per cent. capacity rule should be used as a test and a check upon him to indicate what he ought to produce.

But if he fails to produce it, and the failure is his own fault or negligence, then he should pay the tax; if it is not his fault, then he should not pay it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORT. At the proper time I desire to move to strike out the proviso.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose, when the pending amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. BANNING. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] desires to move to strike out the proviso I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HANNA. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] that we had better strike out what he moves to strike out, as that is the only part that is retroactive.

Mr. BANNING. Very well; let the amendment be voted on.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it the 1st day of January, 1874, instead of the 6th day of September, 1875.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is an amendment to the text of the bill, just as the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] is to the text of the bill.

Mr. BANNING. Can I offer it as a substitute for his motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] may move to strike out more than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] moves to strike out, and to insert something in its stead.

Mr. TUCKER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that to strike out the entire proviso would leave open to adjudication all claims for remission or refunding of such taxes as have been collected from the time the internal-revenue laws first went into force. I would suggest that it would be well to have some limitation, say five years.

Mr. HANNA. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has given the matter more attention than I have, I would ask him this question: suppose the proviso is stricken out; do I understand the gentleman to say that by the provisions of this section the doors would be open for all parties feeling aggrieved to go back indefinitely?

Mr. TUCKER. I think so.

Mr. HANNA. With all due respect, I think he is in error. I think this section would apply to cases arising hereafter.

Mr. TUCKER. The section provides—and I call the attention of the gentleman to the exact words—"that whenever under the provisions of section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, any assessments shall have been made against a distiller for a deficiency," &c. The section does not read "whenever an assessment shall be made," but "shall have been made;" so that it would apply retroactively to all cases.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not see any reason for this proviso. I do not see why, if we should go back three years and refund such taxes, we should not go all the way back. I understand it will not take a very large sum. If the law has been unjust in the past, let us correct it. It is not retroactive, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] suggests, to remedy that which is wrong.

I have two cases in my mind where men have paid capacity taxes. In the one instance the distillery was stopped by an unseasonable overflow, which prevented the owner from running his machinery at all; he could do nothing at all. In that case he paid over $4,000 capacity tax. I know another case where a man was compelled to pay a capacity tax, not from any fault of his own, but because his machinery broke down. It that case he paid $1,900, and the Government has taken that money from these men.

Mr. DENISON. The distillers have made it up out of others.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman suggests that they may have made it up out of the balance of their productions. If he means that because the Government can get an advantage over one man and not over all who are engaged in the same kind of business, and if he means that that is dignified, proper, and just in a great nation, then all I have to say to him is that if he thinks so it may be well enough for him, but my poor capacity will not allow me to view it in that light at all.

I have referred to these cases where misfortunes overtook the men who are engaged in this business. By this bill they will be cut off absolutely from all remedy. Besides paying the tax, they were subjected to other misfortunes for which they were not responsible.

My suggestion is that if we are going to remedy for three years back these things which are pronounced wrong, then let us go back further and correct all the wrong.

Mr. TUCKER. How long would the gentleman go back?

Mr. KEIFER. I would go back indefinitely.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If this tax has been collected under a general law for ten or twelve years, is it not true that distillers have charged any losses they have made in their business as a rule upon their customers; and have they not been reimbursed for all those losses and have not the people paid them? If that is true, is not the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] an effort merely to pass through a lot of claims for the benefit of individual distillers, when the people have borne all the losses which the distillers have sustained?

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman to suggest that because distillers generally have charged higher rates by reason of their losses and of the unjust taxes collected by the Government, he would still insist that the individuals who have been engaged in this business, and some of whom have been destroyed by reason of the operation of the law, should continue to suffer from it. Now, I do not think so.

Mr. BANNING. In order to accommodate all gentlemen, I desire to modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] and strike out all after the word "premises" in the twenty-third line. I do this because I think the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] in charge of the bill must have satisfied every member of the House that it is right to make this modification. He says that these taxes have been wrongfully collected, and that in the future these wrongfully collected taxes should be refunded. If it was wrong to collect this tax for a year or two years or three years, then it has always been wrong; and the tax ought to be refunded to these men who pay so much for the support of the Government.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman will allow me to say that I certainly was unfortunate in conveying my ideas if I gave the impression by any remarks of mine that this tax has been heretofore unjustly collected. The law up to this time has required the production of 80 per cent. of the distilling capacity; and if the distiller after the capacity of his distillery is ascertained and his tubs are opened does not mash a pound of grain for a month, the law as it has been compels him to pay the tax. Now we propose as to the future to modify the law and say that the 80 per cent. capacity hereafter shall be only as a check or test in order to detect whether the distiller is guilty of fraud. But it is an entirely different proposition that, because you thus change the law in reference to the future, the distiller shall be entitled to have refunded to him the taxes which have been collected under the law as it has stood.

Mr. BANNING. I think I did not misunderstand the gentleman. He says that whether the whisky was produced or not, whether there was anything upon which the tax should have been levied or not, the distiller has been made to pay taxes to the amount of the capacity of his distillery. It is now admitted that such collection of taxes was wrongful, and as a remedy it is proposed to declare in this bill that no such tax shall be collected hereafter. I say that certainly this has been a wrongful collection of the tax from the beginning, and that if it is right to remedy the matter for the future, then it is right to remedy it for the past.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? This amendment is manifestly wrong, unless the Internal-Revenue Bureau has help enough to keep up its business. Now, as I understand, there is no Department or bureau of the Government that can keep its business up within three months.

Mr. BANNING. I do not see what this has to do with the question of help in the Internal-Revenue Bureau. This is a question of helping the distiller to his rights.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Under the provision already adopted these arrearages with reference to the capacity of distilleries cannot be charged against the distiller after the lapse of three months from the filing of his report. Now if the bureau cannot keep up its business within three months then of course there never will be any collection of these taxes, however much fraud may be committed by the distiller.

Mr. BANNING. The argument is that if the Government has not force enough to keep up with its work any tax wrongfully collected from a distiller must be retained by the Government, but if more help is provided, so that the Government can keep up with its work, then the tax may be paid back.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That is not a fair statement of the argument.

Mr. BANNING. I do not see the logic of this reasoning. It seems to me this is a simple question of justice to the distiller.

Mr. TUCKER. Will my friend from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] permit me just a moment? I suppose that he accepts my suggestion as to providing that no claim for remission or refunding of taxes shall extend back of the 1st of January, 1874. That is nearly five years, and I think it must meet the views of all gentlemen here.

Mr. BANNING. That would be quite satisfactory to me, but the cases mentioned by my friend from Illinois and my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] would not be cured by such an amendment, as I understand.

Mr. VANCE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] agree to the 1st of January, 1873?

Mr. BURCHARD. Oh, I cannot agree to that. Let the House vote on the question. I do not desire to oppose any proposition which the House may think ought to prevail.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The bill is right as it is.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is what I think.

Mr. VANCE. May I not offer an amendment to fix the 1st of January, 1873, instead of September 6, 1875?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to move any amendment to perfect the text before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out.

Mr. VANCE. I move, then, to amend by inserting January 1, 1873.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to suggest that there is no equity in fixing arbitrarily a time within which persons having equitable claims against the Government——

Mr. VANCE. I suggest to the gentleman that after the text is perfected he can move to strike out.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to perfect the text; I prefer that it should be struck out in its present condition.

Mr. BROWNE. I think that the provision of the bill as reported is just as it should be. Certainly for more than ten years every one who has engaged in the business of distilling spirits has accepted authority to do so with the knowledge that he would be compelled to pay tax upon 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery. He must pay the tax on all spirits distilled; but whether he produces the spirits or not he must pay upon 80 per cent. of the capacity of his distillery. Every distiller in this country for more than ten years has paid upon that basis, and every man who has engaged in it has engaged in it with the full knowledge that he would be compelled to pay the tax upon 80 per cent. of the capacity of his distillery, whether the spirits are produced or not. That he has so paid is no injustice to him; it was the law, and he knew it was the law.

Mr. FORT. At that time there may have been a change of capacity so it was impossible to make 80 per cent. from the distillery, and as it takes three days for the beer to go through the tubs, during that time the distiller is compelled to submit to this robbery in being taxed upon a greater capacity than that possessed by the establishment.

Mr. BROWNE. That may be true, Mr. Speaker, but the men who engaged in the business knew the difficulties by which they might be surrounded if they undertook to do business with the law as it then was. What I understand the truth to be is that these distillers do not complain up to the 6th of September, 1875, that they have been thus assessed.

Several MEMBERS. Yes, they do.

Mr. BROWNE. Well, perhaps they complain that they have been compelled to pay any tax at all; I do not know but what they do; but I state it as a fact that the evil sought to be remedied here is just this: on the 6th of September, 1875, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Pratt, issued an order in regard to the duty of distillers when they gave notice of a change in the capacity of their distilleries, and I undertake to say, having examined the law under the light of the facts, that when the Commissioner of Internal Revenue issued that order it produced confusion; the revenue officers did not comprehend it and the distillers themselves became confused and in almost every case which transpired under it mistakes were made and distillers compelled to pay in excess of the amount of tax imposed by law. The provision in this section in its operation is limited to that date simply for the purpose of taking up and curing the evils which occurred under that order. So far as the law was concerned antecedent to that date, the fixing of the tax upon 80 per cent. of the capacity of the distillery, it was the law and it remained the law, and the distillers knew exactly what to expect under it. The other was not a law, but merely an interpretation of a law which confused everybody. If this provision is stricken out and the proviso is made retroactive so as to cover all cases which occur in ten years, it will almost bankrupt the Treasury.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to make but one suggestion in reply to my colleague. He talks about this bankrupting the Treasury of the United States. If he will turn to the Revised Statutes, on page 664, and read section 3309, he will find the section as amended and perfected was passed in June, 1872. It is true there have been some provisions commencing back to 1868, but the section as perfected was passed in June, 1872. I say the distillers generally could not have known what the law was much before the 1st of January, 1873, because the laws were not generally distributed among the masses before that time. I submit, if the committee will accept the 1st of January, 1873, or I will say 1874, manifest justice would be done and the Treasury will not be made bankrupt. There will be nothing taken out of the Treasury that in my judgment lawfully went into the Treasury. That is what we are getting at; we want to deal justly with every class of tax-payers, whether engaged in the manufacture of whisky, or tobacco, or anything else upon which the Government collects taxes.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let me suggest that this provision is older than 1872. It is part of the original law.

Mr. HANNA. If you will take up the act of 1868, and then the act of 1869, and then the act of 1872, you will find it was not until the perfecting of section 3309 that you will find this provision "provided the actual product shall be deemed to be in no case less than 80 per cent." Now, it is since 1872 that this class of cases has sprung up and been brought before Congress and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, parties claiming relief for overtaxation. If we will take either 1873 or 1874 we will then only include the meritorious cases, and that we ought to do. I thought upon the first reading of this section if you struck out all after the word "provided" there would be no relief at all, but on more careful examination I think all persons would be relieved because the section as drawn is in fact retroactive. I should be glad to agree to the 1st of January, 1874.

Mr. BURCHARD. I am on the floor and believe I will demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to make a suggestion. The gentleman must be mistaken in regard to the law as to 80 per cent. of capacity not being the test prior to 1872. They were required to produce 80 per cent. under the act of 1868 as well as the act of 1872. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [MR. VANCE.]

The amendment was again read, as follows:

In lines 26 and 27, strike out "6th day of September, 1875," and insert in lieu thereof "1st day of January, 1873."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 20, noes 54.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave;

An act (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston;

An act (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws;

An act (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3369) to provide for the publication of notices of contest under the homestead, pre-emption, and tree-culture laws of the United States;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Des Moines, Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 4713) supplementary to the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act supplemental to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating Columbian College, District of Columbia;"

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) to pay the laborers known as cloak-room men and to place them on the Doorkeeper's roll; and

An act (H. R. No. 4663) to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes.

INTERNAL-REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the laws relating to internal-revenue.

Mr. TUCKER. I will now propose, looking to the sentiments which have been expressed, to amend the proviso by striking out the word "heretofore," in line 25, and all after the word "made," and inserting "prior to January 1, 1874;" so that it will read:

Provided, That no tax shall be remitted or refunded under the provisions of this section under any assessment made prior to January 1, 1874.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Why should we grant relief to men who were required to pay this tax in 1874 and not to those who paid it in 1873? What difference is there between them?

Mr. TUCKER. I am about to answer that question. It is in accordance with the principle of the statute of limitations. If you go further back there is greater room for fraud. If you go back to January, 1874, only, the transaction is more recent and is more capable of explanation.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to make a suggestion in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] He suggests that his amendment is in the nature of a statute of limitations. How can this be? If these people who have paid a tax unjustly have never had the right to apply for its return, can it be said they are cut off by a statute of limitations? The gentleman's proposition is to give to all persons who have been compelled to pay such a tax since January 1, 1874, the right to recover it back; but persons who paid such a tax before that time and who have never had a right to make a claim for its return, are to have their claims cut off by what the gentleman chooses to call a statute of limitations. Statutes of limitations are made to cut off rights or remedies where they exist. It is a hard rule to say to persons who have just and equitable claims against the Government, but who never had the right to present them under any general law, that their claims are too old for payment, and others who have similar claims but of a more recent date should be paid or have the tax unjustly collected refunded. If it is right to pay any of this class of claims they should all be paid. You might very properly say to the persons who claim they have paid tax on account of whisky or spirits which they never manufactured, that they must present their claims within a particular time to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or have them forever barred.

It is a singular thing to apply the statute of limitations to cut off rights or remedies when they never existed. A party should at least have a short day in which to assert his rights if any he had. If we pay any of the tax on spirits wrongfully or unjustly collected, we should pay it all. It may be unwise to repay any of such tax.

Mr. TUCKER. While I do not agree with the stringent views of some gentlemen who contend that the law fixes a tax on what these men did not make, yet that was the law; and now we propose to relieve from the stringencies of a previous legal provision. The question is, how far shall we go back to allow these parties to be paid back out of the Treasury what they paid in under legal provisions? And I say if you go back to the 1st of January, 1874, you will be going as far back as I think is proper.

Mr. BROWNE. Are there any reasons for the relief going back to the 6th of September, 1875, that do not apply to any antecedent date?

Mr. TUCKER. I think there are.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to hear them.

Mr. TUCKER. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has already explained the reasons. I leave the matter, so far as that is concerned, in his hands.

Mr. BURCHARD. I think the House understands that. This is intended to afford relief for what took place under the order made by the Commissioner, which the office is now satisfied was a mistake. To give that relief is the intention of the section.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is it in order now to move to strike out the proviso?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is now pending.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Would it be in order to move to amend in line 3 by striking out "have been" and inserting "be;" so that it will read:

That whenever under the provisions of section 3309 of the Revised Statutes an assessment shall be made against a distiller, &c.?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That amendment would not be in order till a vote is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] which applies to the proviso of the section.

The question being taken on Mr. TUCKER's amendment, there were—ayes 52, noes 41.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on Mr. BANNING's motion to strike out the proviso; and being taken, there were—ayes 21, noes 64.

So (further count not being demanded) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CABELL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 7, after the word "molasses," insert the words "or fruit;" in line 9, after the word "molasses," insert the words "or fruit;" in line 15, after the word "grain," insert the words "or molasses or fruit;" so that in each case it will read, "such excessive use of grain or molasses or fruit."

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to that amendment. I think there has not been and never will be an excessive use of fruit.

Mr. CABELL. Cases of that kind have occurred, and therefore I offer the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. I would support this amendment very cheerfully if the gentleman from Virginia would indicate what object it is intended to accomplish.

Mr. CABELL. This section provides for the refund in certain cases of the tax upon the spirits that should have been produced from the grain or molasses used in excess of the capacity of the distillery. The same reason applies in the case of spirits produced from fruit. The insertion of the word "fruit" is simply to put the distillers of fruit on the same footing as the distillers of grain or molasses. It evidently can do no harm.

Mr. BURCHARD. I only desire to say that the law now gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the power to exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, or grapes from all the provisions of the internal-revenue law except the payment of taxes. I think they are not liable for assessment for capacity. If they are, I suppose it is under the regulations, and I have not the regulations here. I will not object to this amendment, although I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. BROWNE. I never heard of a fruit distiller being required to pay a tax on capacity, either under a regulation or under the law.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I will say that it is the practice, and is done every day.

Mr. CABELL. It may be under some regulation of the Department rather than under the statute itself; but such is the practice, I am quite sure.

The amendment of Mr. CABELL was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I move to amend this section by striking out, in line 3, the words "have been," and inserting in lieu the word "be," so that it will read, "that whenever an assessment shall be made against a distiller, &c.;" also to strike out all after and including the word "provided," in line 23.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The latter part of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out the proviso, is not in order, because the House has already voted on that proposition and rejected it.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I wish to explain the reason why I have offered the one amendment in connection with the other. The House has been unable to have a square vote on the proposition as to whether they will go back at all for the repayment of these capacity taxes. When the question was taken on the motion to strike out the proviso, some voted against it on the assumption that the section thus amended would allow this repayment of capacity tax to go back indefinitely; and I think that assumption is clearly correct. Others voted for it because they expected that after the proviso was stricken out they would subsequently have an opportunity to vote to strike out the words "have been," and to insert the word "be."

Now, in order that the House may have a fair vote on this question as to whether we shall go back at all in the matter of these capacity taxes I have put the two amendments together, to strike out "have been" and insert "be," and also to strike out the proviso.

My judgment is that we should not go back at all; but I see no reason whatever why, if we go back one year, we should not go back ten, except, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] the danger of opening and adjudicating stale cases.

My colleague [Mr. KEIFER] says that these men have had no opportunity to present these claims. The fact is, they have no claims at all under the law; it is simply a question as to whether this House will, in this general law, pass a private bill for the relief of A, B, and C, who have paid this capacity tax; or, whether we will say that in a general law we will not provide for special cases.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BANNING. Does not the gentleman know that there are taxes now being collected which in the opinion of the collector ought not in justice and in equity be collected?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. In the opinion of the collector——

Mr. BANNING. I mean, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Does he not know that it is the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that these taxes ought not to be collected; that they are unjust and wrong?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. We are not to be guided solely by the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or tax collectors, and I undertake to say that, in the opinion of the men who pay the taxes, there has not been a tax law passed since 1861 that is not unjust in some of its provisions.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman allow me to give him a piece of information?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. It is that in the city represented in part by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] distillers have already brought suits in the United States courts for these assessments made under what is known as the Pratt order, and the United States courts have decided that the Government is compelled to repay those taxes.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. The gentleman gives me a piece of information that I already have.

Mr. BROWNE. Then if it has been decided by the court that under the law these taxes that have been assessed and paid ought to be refunded, will the gentleman put every distiller who has paid these taxes to the trouble of going into the courts in order to find his remedy, or will we provide here at once, as is but right and just, for his payment?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. If the United States circuit or district court decides a question the authorities at Washington are not bound to follow that decision until it is affirmed by the higher court. If the higher court affirms the decision of the lower courts, then the Commissioner already has the authority given under this bill.

Mr. BROWNE. Not at all.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Certainly he has.

Mr. BROWNE. In the event of the higher court affirming the decision of the lower court, how is the money to be paid to the distiller?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. If it has been illegally collected it may be refunded.

Mr. BROWNE. How is it to be repaid until we appropriate the money for that purpose?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. This is not an appropriation bill, and does not appropriate money. If we pass a law to give the right to a man who has paid this tax within two years to be repaid, then we can equally as well pass a law to give the right to any man who has paid it within the last fifteen years. It is not cut off by the statute of limitation, as the man has had no remedy heretofore. If we pass a law that provides for the allowance of the private claim of a man who paid this tax a year ago, then we can just as well provide for private claims running back for fifteen years. The trouble about the whole thing is that the law is retroactive, and all retroactive laws are vicious.

Mr. BROWNE. The trouble was that the Internal-Revenue department adopted a rule which the distiller could not execute without putting his foot in it, just as Charles Lamb said that he never opened his mouth without putting his foot in it. [Laughter.] The distiller could not carry on his business under the order without making himself liable for the payment of taxes which he ought not to pay.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. The truth about the matter is that in the effort to get the distiller's foot out it is proposed to put the foot of the Government in. The law must be taken as a whole; and as has been suggested the distillers make up in one place what they lose in another. They get back what they pay, in the price they put upon their whisky when they sell it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio so modify his amendment as to bring it within the rules of the House?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I desire to modify my amendment so as to strike out the entire section and to substitute the same section, omitting the proviso and changing the words "have been" to the word "be."

The substitute proposed by Mr. JONES, of Ohio, was as follows:

That whenever, under the provisions of section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, an assessment shall be made against a distiller for a deficiency in not producing 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery as established by law, or for the tax upon the spirits that should have been produced from the grain or molasses found to have been used in excess of the capacity of his distillery for any month, as estimated according to law, such excessive use of grain or molasses having arisen from a failure on the part of the distiller to maintain the capacity required by law to enable him to use such grain or molasses without incurring liability to such assessment, and it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that said deficiency, or that said failure, whereby such excessive use of grain arose, was not occasioned by any want of diligence or by any fraudulent purpose on the part of the distiller, but from misunderstanding as to the requirements of the law and regulations in that respect, then, and in such case, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized, on appeal made to him, to remit or refund such tax, or such part thereof as shall appear to him to be equitable and just in the premises.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the section applies only to the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to remit or refund taxes; and the proviso limits his power to cases arising since January 1, 1874. If in any case arising prior to that date the party ought to have a remission or refunding of his tax, all he has to do is to come to Congress for redress. He is not precluded from that remedy. The proviso only limits the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue so that he shall not remit or refund any tax in a case arising prior to January 1, 1874.

Mr. BANNING. I certainly hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] will not prevail. Its only effect will be that these distillers who now pay so large a tax will be driven into the courts and subjected to the expense of employing attorneys in order to recover what is acknowledged to be their own. I hope this House will do no such unjust act. The pending amendment concedes that the provision of the present law has been wrongfully construed and wrongfully enforced; yet it proposes the Government shall retain the tax which has been improperly collected, unless these men, through expensive proceedings in court, can recover the money acknowledged to be their own.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HANNA. Before the vote is taken I want to ask one question. I understood from the gentleman from Virginia, and perhaps from the gentleman from Illinois, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself has recommended that some such remedial measure as that incorporated in this section be adopted by Congress.

Mr. BURCHARD. For all assessments that occurred under the order of September 6, 1875.

Mr. HANNA. Now, this amendment offered by my friend from Ohio seeks, as I understand, to antagonize the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. BURCHARD. It makes the provision a prospective one.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I propose to legislate for the future, not for the past.

Mr. HANNA. I am opposed to this amendment because it destroys the whole effect of the provision as a remedial measure.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Ohio, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 12, noes not counted.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to move an amendment to strike out all from line 193, on page 19, down to line 235, on page 21. I hope that gentlemen on the committee will not object to going back.

The matter proposed by Mr. ROBBINS to be struck out was as follows:

That section 3332 be amended by adding thereto as follows:
And in case of seizure of a still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, fermenting-tub, or other distilling apparatus, having a less producing capacity than one hundred and fifty gallons per day, for any offense involving forfeiture of the same, where said apparatus shall be of less than $500 value, and not in the possession of any one claiming to be the owner thereof, and where it shall be impracticable to remove the same to a place of safe storage from the place where seized, the seizing officer is authorized to so destroy the same as to prevent the use thereof, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of distilling: Provided, That such destruction shall be in the presence of at least one credible witness, and that such witness shall unite with the said officer in a duly sworn report of said seizure and destruction, to be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which report they shall set forth the grounds of the claim of forfeiture, the reasons for such seizure and destruction, their estimate of the fair cash value of the apparatus destroyed, and also of the materials remaining after such destruction, and a statement that, from facts within their own knowledge, they have no doubt whatever that said distilling apparatus was set up for use and not registered, or had been used in the unlawful distillation of spirits, and that it was impracticable to remove the same to a place of safe storage. Within one year after such destruction, the owner of the apparatus so destroyed may make application to the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for reimbursement of the value of the same; and if he shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Secretary and the Commissioner, that said apparatus was owned by him at the time of its destruction, and that it had not been set up without registering, or had not been used in the unlawful distillation of spirits, the Secretary may make an allowance to said owner, not exceeding the value of said apparatus, as sworn to in the report of the seizing officer as aforesaid, less the value of the materials, as estimated in said report. And for a wrongful seizure and destruction of property under the foregoing provisions, the owner thereof shall have right of action on the official bond of the officer who occasioned the destruction for all damages caused thereby.

Mr. BURCHARD. We have already considered that part of the bill; I hope we shall not go back.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask the gentleman to let me state the object of the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will hear the gentleman, reserving the point of order.

Mr. ROBBINS. The portion of the bill which I propose to strike out provides that stills may be destroyed for any offense involving forfeiture of the same. If I understand the provision correctly, it authorizes the internal-revenue officer or agent to be the judge whether there has been an offense involving forfeiture, whereas the law as it now stands only permits such destruction after judgment of forfeiture has been rendered by a court. It may be proper to allow stills to be destroyed when they have been adjudged forfeited; but I must protest against allowing this destruction of property upon the mere option of the agent or deputy who may undertake to decide on his individual judgment that an offense involving forfeiture has been committed. This provision takes the trial of the case away from the court and gives it to the revenue officer. I submit that it is highly objectionable to give to the revenue agent this power of destroying property. I hope the provision will be struck out and the law left as it now stands.

Mr. BURCHARD. I must insist on my point of order against the amendment, and I will say that if gentlemen will read the whole provision through they will see that the objection they make to it does not apply.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read it through, and it simply provides facilities for destroying property.

Mr. BURCHARD. It allows compensation to a man if his property is unjustly destroyed.

Mr. ROBBINS. How can it be to the interest of the Government to destroy property and afterward pay for it?

Mr. BURCHARD. I want to get through with this bill; I must insist that we proceed in order.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am as anxious as anybody else to go on with this bill; but I hope we shall be permitted at least to vote on this question. As a member of the committee who reported the bill, I beg the privilege of saying that we reported it simply as a matter of form to be amended in the House, because it embraces so many matters of detail that we did not have time in committee to examine it thoroughly. I take the liberty of saying that I am not responsible for this part of the bill; I utterly refuse to be held accountable for it, and I hope the House will have an opportunity to vote upon the provision.

Mr. SCALES. I rise to a point of order. Can we go back by common consent to allow the gentleman to be heard on a section and not be permitted to vote on the amendment he proposes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Consent was given only to the extent of allowing the gentleman from North Carolina to make an explanation of his amendment, the point of order being expressly reserved by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TUCKER. I believe my friend from Illinois will allow the amendment to come in.

Mr. BURCHARD. Was there not a vote on the proposition taken to strike out on Saturday last?

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANNA. Did not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PRIDEMORE] move to strike that out?

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I did; but not to the same extent moved by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Now if the gentleman from North Carolina will hear me a moment I think he will withdraw his objection. There is a general statute upon the statute-book which makes the regulations of the Internal-Revenue department the law of the land. The Internal-Revenue Office has prescribed the rules for sequestration and destruction of this property. It is the every-day practice of the Revenue department officers, whether it is the law or not. The internal-revenue officers go abroad in the land, tear out still-houses, break them up and cut the stills in many localities where the property might be sold and a profit made out of it to the Government. I know it is the every-day practice; that they go like vagrants over the land, destroying property, and they pretend to do it under the sanction of the law. They do it under the eye of the United States courts and United States marshals. I believe they do it under the instructions of the Internal Revenue Bureau, and they hold that under the statutes they can do so. I say to my friend, therefore, that the section as reported in this bill is an improvement upon the practice at the present day of internal-revenue officers, if not an improvement upon the law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This discussion is all out of order, unless the amendment is allowed to be offered. There is nothing now before the House.

Mr. TUCKER. I believe my colleague on the committee from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. On the appeal of the gentleman from Virginia I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment is pending, objection having been withdrawn.

Mr. TUCKER. I think one word of explanation will satisfy my friend from North Carolina. He will find the only cases in which seizures can be made under this is where the property is worth less than $500 in value and there is no person claiming to be the owner thereof, or where it shall be impracticable to remove the same to a place of safe storage, and seizing and destroying the same only so far as to prevent the use thereof or any part thereof for the purpose of a still. And then there is a provision in the latter part of the section that on the application of the owner to the Secretary of the Treasury he may be reimbursed for wrongful loss of property. And there is an additional provision which is a very rare one in internal revenue laws:

And for the wrongful seizure and destruction of property under the foregoing provision the owner thereof shall have a right of action on the official bond of the officer who occasioned the destruction, and for all damage caused thereby.

So the only case where any seizure or destruction can be had is in a case where it is not in the hands of the owner, where it appears to be used unlawfully, or where it is incapable of being removed to any place of safe storage, and in all such cases the owner can apply to the Secretary of the Treasury for reimbursement, and have the right of action on the official bonds of the officers making the seizure.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I ask the gentleman to look at line 226, on page 21, and say whether the committee will not accept an amendment of this kind, which seems to be just: "to be set up by his consent and within his knowledge." I can illustrate by cases showing that such an amendment ought to be introduced, that the sequestration of property should only take place where they are set up by the consent of the owner or within his knowledge. Where a tenant would set up a still against the law without the knowledge and consent of the owner of the property there should certainly be no sequestration or forfeiture of the property of the owner; that should take place only when set up by his consent, or used only when within his knowledge for illicit purposes. In that view I ask that the words be inserted "set up by his consent or within his knowledge."

Mr. ROBBINS. Was not the objection to my amendment withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was, and the amendment is now pending.

Mr. ROBBINS. As my amendment is now pending, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, that I will agree if you destroy property at all without authority of law beforehand it is well to make provision to pay for the wrong. But it is a great deal better to have no law authorizing such wrong than to have the agents of the United States go out and destroy property where the Government afterward has to pay for it. I think we had better put the matter of destroying property out of the power of men except after judgment of the court has been rendered that the property is forfeited to the United States. The present law does that. This law proposes to allow agents to do it on their own hook, to judge for themselves the offense involving forfeiture has been committed.

Now, I suggest it is very poor policy to destroy this property. I know very well this matter of destroying property has created more ill-feeling in the country, more hatred against the revenue, more unwillingness to abide by the revenue law, than almost any other feature of the whole system.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And it has cost the loss of life, too.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this has caused more friction in the working of the revenue law than almost any other part of it. It has a bad influence upon a section of the country to see the Government destroying property. Everybody asks, "Why is that property destroyed?" There is no part of this country so remote that property cannot be transferred from it to some place of storage. There is no place so remote but you can carry the property to a proper place for safe storage. These agents destroyed it merely for their own convenience.

Mr. BURCHARD. But there are stills in localities where there are no storekeepers.

Mr. ROBBINS. There are storekeepers in the same country where the stills are. This exerts a bad influence on the minds of the people. They ask the question, "Why does the Government destroy this property?" The property is ruined and there is a loss to the owner and a loss to the Government. I do not want to pass any law that will facilitate that business any more than now.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to ask for a vote; but before the House comes to a vote I desire to say just one word. The trouble about seizing and taking these stills, which the gentleman from North Carolina thinks would be preferable, is that the officers patrolling through a district usually or very frequently are mounted on horseback. They have no vehicles, no wagons in which to take the still. It is a simple, cheap, inexpensive concern, having a capacity, as I understand, of only a few gallons in a day. It is difficult to carry these stills away, and it is not worth while to do so. But if they are left there they can be loaded on wagons and disappear and are never seen again by the officer.

Now, if the officers do not have the conveyances and vehicles necessary for carrying these stills to a place where they can be condemned what shall they do? If they are not removed the stills will be taken by the illicit distillers and moved to some of their places and will never be again seen until they are discovered in the act of distilling.

This law does not provide for the destruction of these stills when they can be carried away. If the officers have the wagons and think it proper they can take them away. But if in riding through the country they come upon a still in a glen or mountain region where they cannot bear it away, then they are authorized to destroy it.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina does not desire and no gentleman desires to protect any that are engaged in the illicit distillation of spirits. They only want to relieve from hardship the innocent man who is engaged rightfully and properly in the distillation of spirits. There were nearly six hundred of such stills actually seized within the last fiscal year; rightfully seized as far as anything appears to the contrary; stills that were not registered, that were not authorized. And the honest distillers of the country, who paid over $50,000,000 of revenue to the Government, have a right to ask the Department or Congress to protect them with the whole force of the Government against the illicit distillers, so that those who are engaged in illicit distillation shall receive no favor from this House, but that you shall protect the honest man and give him the right to go to the Treasury and prove that his property has been wrongfully destroyed.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to strike out the last word.

As regards the statement of my friend that when the distillery is seized the still may be moved before the officer returns, I desire to say in reply that that distillery is effectually stopped and broken up if the still is removed, as much as if it were cut in pieces. You have stopped that distillery by compelling the still to be taken down and carried away.

Mr. McCOOK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCOOK. Has it ever been the case that any distillery which has complied with the requirements of the law has been seized by revenue officers and sold in this way?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know of any such.

Mr. McCOOK. These are illicit distilleries?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCOOK. Now should any more consideration be shown to these men who are engaged in the illicit distillation of liquor than to men engaged in the business of counterfeiting found with the dies in their possession?

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not offering this amendment in order to favor the distillers, but in order to prevent a useless destruction of property. It is a loss to everybody, a gain to nobody. The Government loses and the people lose. You do not break up the distillery more effectually in this way than you do by taking down the still.

Mr. BURCHARD. The people do not lose; the property is forfeited.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is another feature about this. It speaks of stills that produce but few gallons a day. It is legislation against the poorer and humbler class of men. You say nothing here about destroying stills worth a thousand dollars or making a thousand gallons a day. But you go to the common people and say that their little stills shall be cut up and destroyed. That produces an evil influence and a bad feeling. A great deal of the trouble that you hear of down in my country and in the mountains of Tennessee, the collisions between the revenue officers and the people, originates from the manner in which this thing is done. It addresses itself to the common sense of these mountain people as an absurdity for the Government officers to go around and destroy property instead of taking it, utilizing it, and getting some benefit from it.

I have heard some of these very men who used these little stills say that if the Government should take their stills when they had been violating the law and make them of some benefit to the Treasury, they would not say a word; but to see these drunken fellows come there and destroy the property——

Mr. RIDDLE. Is not this provision more favorable to the small distiller than the existing law?

Mr. ROBBINS. The existing law requires judgment of forfeiture before a still is destroyed. This section says that any still may be destroyed for any offense involving forfeiture. Now who is to judge of that? The officer, and not the court.

Mr. STEELE. The great difficulty of this whole thing is that under the provisions of the existing law, as I understand, a judgment is rendered before the property is destroyed. In old times I often heard the phrase, "Strike, but hear." That phrase is as full of nonsense as any I ever heard used, and you propose by this section to give the officer power to strike and then to hear. After the wrong is done you propose to give these parties a hearing.

My colleague [Mr. ROBBINS] has stated very truly that one of the worst iniquities of this system is that a persistent effort seems to be made on the part of Congress to adopt legislation against the small men of the country; I mean the men of small means; that odious and unjust discriminations are made against men of small means. And if we object to that, then we are taunted with being apologists for the men who are called moonshiners. Now, I have no apology to make for any violation of the law. I say that, however iniquitous and unjust a law may be, the best policy is to wait for peaceful means of remedying that law, and not take justice into a man's own hands. And that is the opinion of everybody who concurs in sentiment with me upon this subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I desire to say a word or two on this subject. I am no apologist for whisky or for liquor of any sort; I neither make it nor use it. But while I say this, I have been trained from my infancy to observe the laws of the country.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] on Saturday last referred to what he said was the disposition upon the part of the people in the southern portion of this country to disobey the law. Now I will state the point at which all the trouble arises that has occurred upon the subject of the distillation of whisky. It is not that the people in my State or in the State of North Carolina or in any other southern State are disposed to rebel against the law upon the subject of whisky.

I say that all the trouble that has arisen originates from the fact that a lawless set of thieving rascals have gone through the country destroying the people's property and drinking the whisky they have made and getting drunk themselves. When they do that it enrages the people. If a man comes to your house and because you have violated the law destroys your property before your eyes, it enrages you as a citizen. He is no more justified in doing that than a man is justified in violating the law.

I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] to commence and count noses and see where the most gigantic frauds have been perpetrated or attempted to be perpetrated upon the Government under this revenue law. I tell him that they have occurred in the States of the North, and not so much in the States of the South. Take a wholesale distiller in the North who has made his thousands and tens of thousands of gallons of whisky in violation of the law, and where has the man been punished for it? Name him. The fact is that thousands upon thousands of gallons of liquor have been made in violation of the law in the Northern States, and in a great measure the men have gone unpunished for it.

Down in our mountainous sections of the country, where a man wants to make a little mountain dew, and to make it honestly and drink it in the same way, if he happens to make a dozen gallons more than the law allows, then his property is destroyed in his very presence and he is arrested by these little spies going through the country and taken from a hundred to a hundred and fifty miles to attend court without a dollar in his pocket, and generally turned loose without any accusation against him and has to beg his way home.

There is where the evil originates that arises under this law. It is in those who are attempting or pretending to enforce the law. They are the ones who violate the law, and the people become enraged and then they get to killing one another in various parts of the country.

I say those who administer the law ought to obey the law. No man should destroy property before it has been adjudged to be forfeited.

Mr. TUCKER. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman to a fact which I have already mentioned. If the still is int he possession of the owner, then the provisions of this bill do not apply; if it is in the possession of a stranger and used for an illegal purpose, then this bill says it may be destroyed, if it cannot be removed, rather than be left in the possession of the person so using it illegally.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to denounce the assumption that in the mountainous sections of this country officers of the law are under the necessity of destroying distilleries, and are therefore justified in doing so. I say there is no necessity for the commission of any such wrong, and it is a violation of law. Do gentlemen say that anywhere in this country when a man's property is taken by the officers of the law and cannot be carried away the law therefore authorizes its destruction? I say no; such a proceeding is revolutionary and outrageous. If the officer would observe the law, as he is bound to do, he might carry away the distillery apparatus which had been seized, and have it appropriated in a different manner instead of destroying it. If that were done there would be no such outrageous proceedings as are now carried on in the destruction of distilleries.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ROBBINS, it was not agreed to, there being ayes 38, noes not counted.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] allow me to offer a mere formal amendment to this same section?

Mr. BURCHARD. I shall have to object to going back for any further amendment. Gentlemen all around me join in the objection.

Mr. RIDDLE. I find on examination that the amendment which I offered on Saturday will come in more appropriately as an amendment to the pending section, because it relates to the refunding of taxes. I therefore move to amend by adding to the end of section 6 the following:

That section 3221 be amended as follows:

And when any distilled spirits are destroyed by accidental fire or otherwise, without any fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner thereof, after the time when the same should have been drawn off by the gaugers and placed in the distillery warehouse provided by law, no tax shall be collected on such spirits so destroyed; or, if improperly collected, it shall be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the production of satisfactory proof that the spirits were destroyed as herein specified.

To show the effect of the amendment, I ask that section 3221 be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3221. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the production to him of satisfactory proof of the actual destruction by accidental fire or other casualty, and without any fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner thereof, of any distilled spirits, while the same remained in the custody of any officer of internal revenue in any distillery warehouse or bonded warehouse of the United States, and before the tax thereon had been paid, may abate the amount of internal taxes accruing thereon, and may cancel any warehouse bond, or enter satisfaction thereon, in whole or in part, as the case may be. And if such taxes have been collected since the destruction of said spirits, the said Secretary shall refund the same to the owners thereof out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. RIDDLE. Under that section, the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to abate the amount of internal-revenue tax accruing on distilled spirits destroyed by accidental fire or other casualty without any collusion or negligence on the part of the owner, while the same remained in the custody of any officer of the internal revenue in any distillery warehouse or bonded warehouse of the United States and before the tax had been paid.

Now the owner cannot draw off the spirits from the cistern himself; it must be done, under the law, by the gauger in the presence of the storekeeper. The storekeeper is required to visit all the distilleries for the purpose of drawing off the spirits. In a case which I have in my mind, (in which a bill to refund taxes improperly collected has been passed by the House and is now pending in the Senate,) the gauger was required, by the regulation of the collector of internal revenue, to be at the distillery on the 5th of December. He did not get there until the 7th. The distillery was destroyed by fire on the night of the 6th. Application was made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Douglas, on the 20th of April, 1875, for the refunding of the tax; he declined to grant the application for the simple reason that the statute gave him no authority to do so. Mr. Pratt, formerly Commissioner, told me that the law ought to be amended so as to cover all such cases as this, because they are clearly covered by the equity of the case.

Under the present law, the owner of the distillery has no right whatever to draw off the spirits himself. Even if the gauger is ten days behindhand the spirits must remain in the cistern until he gets there. The object of the amendment I propose is to give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to abate or refund the tax in such cases where the spirits are not drawn off in proper time through the fault of the gauger, and the property is meanwhile destroyed.

In the case to which I have already referred a report drawn by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DAVIS] uses this language:

Section 3221 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to abate the amount of internal-revenue tax accruing on distilled spirits destroyed by accidental fire or other casualty, without any fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner, "while the same remained in the custody of any officer of internal revenue in any distillery warehouse or bonded warehouse of the United States, and before the tax had been paid."

It will be observed that this statute fails to provide for the abatement when the spirits are destroyed before being removed to the warehouse; but, inasmuch as the tax attaches to the subetance "as soon as it is in existence," and as the distiller cannot remove to the distillery warehouse without the supervision of the gauger, and in the presence of the storekeeper; and inasmuch as it was no fault of the owners that it was not gauged, but the failure of the gauger himself to attend in due time, in which event the loss would not have occurred, as he himself testifies, the equity of the statute should extend to this case, and justice requires that the tax shall be refunded.

In this case the tax amounted to $306, which neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the Commissioner had authority to refund. This class of cases are clearly covered by the equity of the law, and there ought to be provision for them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman to strike out the words "by accidental fire or otherwise" and insert "by unavoidable accident." That will cover the whole question.

Mr. TUCKER. I suggest that the gentleman insert instead of the words "or otherwise" the words "or other casualty," the language used in another part of the section.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "accidental fire or otherwise" and inserting "unavoidable accident."

Mr. RIDDLE. I think if you will read section 2231 you will see that the amendment should be modified. The original section uses the language "upon the actual destruction by accidental fire or other casualty." I am willing to make it conform to that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I accept that as a modification of my own amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RIDDLE. Then, as modified, I will accept the gentleman's amendment as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. LATHROP. Is it changed to add those words to the section?

Mr. RIDDLE. It does add those words to the section and covers equitable cases not covered by the section.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LATHROP. That does not cover the difficulty or the doubt which arises whether section 2231 as it is now reads as that section is or whether this is to be made an addition to section 2231.

Mr. RIDDLE. It is an addition to it.

Mr. LATHROP. I do not think your language does that.

Mr. RIDDLE. Read the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2231 be amended as follows, &c.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move to amend it so that it will read "that section 2231 be amended by adding the following," &c.

Mr. BURCHARD. The amendments proposed in this bill or nearly all of them submitted by the committee have been discussed in the Internal-Revenue Bureau. This relief proposed to be given is such as has heretofore been allowed and recommended generally by the Committee of Ways and Means when a proper case came before them. These cases are not frequent. It may be well to make a general provision of law. I should have preferred to have had the case submitted to the department officers, but I shall not oppose the amendment at the present time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RIDDLE's amendment was agreed to.

Section 7 was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. Every rectifier shall, on filing with the collector his notice of intention to commence or continue business, after the passage of this act, and on the 1st day of May, of each succeeding year, make and execute a bond in form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with at least two sureties; said bond to be approved by the collector of the district. The penal sum of said bond shall not be less, in the case of a rectifier who rectifies by the process of redistilling or of leaching, or both, that double the amount of tax imposed by law on the spirits that can be rectified by such rectifier during a period of ten days; and a similar bond may, at the discretion of the Commissioner or the collector of the district, be required of any rectifier by any other process than those hereinbefore named; but in no case shall the penal sum be less than $500 nor more than $50,000. The condition of said bond shall be that the principal shall faithfully comply with all the provisions of law in relation to the duties and business of rectifiers, and shall pay all taxes, penalties incurred, or fines imposed on him for violation of any of the said provisions. A new bond may be required in case of the death, insolvency, or removal of either of the sureties, and in any other contingency affecting its validity or impairing its efficiency, at the discretion of the collector or Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Any rectifier who, after the passage of this act, shall commence business without giving the bond required by this section, or who shall continue to carry on business, after demand for such bond, without giving the same, or who shall fail to renew such bond when lawfully required, or who shall give any false, forged, or fraudulent bond, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I desire to move an amendment to come in at the end of that section.

Mr. TUCKER. Let me perfect the section first.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. I propose to strike out, in line 31, the words "less than $100 nor;" so, if amended, it will read "shall, on conviction, be fined not more than $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to strike out, in line 11, the words "a similar bond may, at the discretion of the Commissioner or the collector of the district, be," and insert "the penal sum of the bond;" and insert after the word "named," in line 14, the words "shall be fixed under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue;" so it will read, "and the penal sum of the bond required of any rectifier by any other process than those hereinbefore named shall be fixed under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I move to add the following:

And any person indicted under this or any other section of the revenue laws now or hereafter in force may, upon his trial, except to any ruling of the court and appeal from the judgment of said court as in other case. The appeal shall be first to the circuit court of the United States and thence to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRENTANO. I move to strike out, in lines 29 and 30, "or who shall give any false, forged, or fraudulent bond," and insert in line 32, after the word "dollars," "and any rectifier who shall give any false, forged, or fraudulent bond shall on conviction be subject to the penalties provided for in section 5418 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman from Illinois has shown me his amendment and I can see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 9 as follows:

SEC. 9. It shall be lawful for any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States within the judicial district for which he is appointed, when he shall find any person in the act of operating an illicit distillery, to arrest such person and take him before any judicial officer named in section 1014 of the Revised Statutes who may reside in the county nearest to the place of arrest, to be examined for the offense charged against him and to be dealt with according to the provisions of sections 1014, 1015, and 1016 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. STEELE. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of that section as a separate and independent section.

Mr. MILLS. Before the gentleman from North Carolina offers a new section, I desire to move to strike out the ninth section. The gentleman's amendment can come in after my motion has been disposed of.

Mr. TUCKER. Before the gentleman from Texas offers his amendment I desire to perfect the section by an amendment. I offer the following amendment:

In line 7, after the word "county," insert the words "of arrest, and if none, then in that county;" so that it will read:

Who may reside in the county of arrest, and if none, then in that county nearest to the place of arrest.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5, strike out the word "any" and insert "the most convenient;" so that it will read:

It shall be lawful for any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States within the judicial district for which he is appointed, when he shall find any person in the act of operating an illicit distillery, to arrest such person and take him before the most convenient judicial officer named in section 1014 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest to the gentleman to make it read "the nearest and most convenient."

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Very well; I accept the modification.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. LATHROP. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5, after the word "him," insert the word "forthwith;" so that it will read:

To arrest such person and take him forthwith before the nearest and most convenient judicial officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles without amendment:

The bill (H. R. No. 4988) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute superintendents of mints or assayers in assay offices assistant treasurers of the United States; and

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) providing for issue of arms to Territories.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The bill (S. No. 126) to change the name of the steamer City of Chester to Portland; and

The bill (S. No. 145) to change the name of the steamer George W. Elder to Columbia.

The message further announced that the Senate had adopted a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, in relation to the award made by the fisheries commission at Halifax.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following to section 9:

Any officer or person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Throughout this whole bill and through the entire revenue law there are carefully provided penalties of fine and imprisonment for the citizens who violate the law; but I can find nowhere any penalty of imprisonment or fine for any officer who violates any provision of the law. Now, I think it but meet and proper that if the citizen is to be subjected to penalties the officer executing the law should be alike subjected to them; so that the citizen, when he has been wronged and when the law has been violated, may have his remedy in the courts as well as the Government. It may be said this can be provided for in the judiciary act; that all these penalties might be provided there. But this is an amendment relating to the internal-revenue system and is germane here. I think that the law should be, as it were, mutual in relation to these parties that are thus, the one executing and the other being executed upon.

It is unnecessary to say that I have no particular spite to gratify in recounting the scenes that have occurred in what I deem a violation of the law. Men may violate the law innocently or they may violate it willfully. That question does not arise here.

If the amendment is adopted I shall renew the amendment voted down when offered to a previous section of the bill which gives the defendant a right to appeal. In many cases citizens have been incarcerated and the community has been satisfied that they have been convicted contrary to all law; and yet you enact against them the most penal law that has ever been placed on the statute-book of any country and you provide that the circuit or district judge shall have absolute control over the citizen, and from his decision there shall be no appeal. You allow the judge to make a man a felon without allowing him an opportunity of purging himself from the odiousness of the decision although afterward it may be admitted that the decision has been wrong.

I hope the House will look at this in the light of that provision of the Constitution which guarantees liberty to every citizen. I ask the adoption of this amendment, and if it be adopted I will follow it up by another giving the defendants the right to appeal. I hope gentlemen will consider that this is a matter which goes to the liberty of the citizen, and that something should be done which will clear jails of the convicts that now disgrace your judicial decisions.

Mr. TUCKER. I think I can show what is the object of this section in a way that will satisfy the most jealous friend of civil liberty. The only purpose of this section is to enable a marshal of the United States to arrest for the purpose of carrying before a judicial officer—a power that is vested by the common law in every sheriff or other executive officer of like character. He can always, upon what appear to him reasonable grounds, arrest a party whom he believes to be guilty of an offense against the law; but he can merely arrest for the purpose of carrying before a judicial officer. It is upon that principle that the night-watch arrests a man who is engaged in disorderly conduct on the street—not for the purpose of committing him to prison, but merely to confine him till he can get him before a judicial officer.

And the distinction is made in an English case in which Lord Tenterden decided, and very happily, too, that while a private citizen has no right to arrest a felon except at his peril—and he must arrest a man guilty of felony or he is liable to civil action—yet a public officer is bound to arrest any party who he has just grounds to believe is a felon, in order to prevent his escape. A man might escape while the sheriff was running to a judicial officer to obtain a warrant.

The distinction is taken that an executive officer is bound by his duty to arrest a party who reasonably appears to him to have been guilty of an offense; and if he does so he is not liable to a civil action. His justification is that he had reasonable ground to believe that the party was guilty of an offense. If a private citizen arrests a man he is bound to prove that he is a felon, else he is liable to a civil action.

Now I beg my friend to understand that a marshal who under this section arrests a party who is innocent, or arrests a party without reasonable ground to believe that he was guilty, is liable to civil action in the State courts. The gentleman need not ask for an appeal. What does he want of an appeal? A marshal arrests a citizen under color of his authority, and he is brought before a State court upon a civil action for damages. If he is cast in damages an appeal may be taken to a State court by the marshal, but there is no appeal to a Federal court.

I would therefore say to my friend that there is no necessity for putting in any amendment of that kind, because the private citizen has the marshal in his power if he acts without reasonable cause, by an action in the State courts.

The whole provision is simply this: where a marshal finds a man engaged in illicit distilling, he may arrest him for the purpose of forthwith taking him before a judicial officer. What judicial officer? A justice of the peace or United States commissioner, who may be most convenient to him in that county; or if there is none in that county, then in the nearest county where there is such an officer. What danger can come from that to the citizen? If there is any danger to the citizen in this provision, then it is a danger that exists in reference to every offense with which he may be charged under the State law or under the Federal law; because there is not an executive officer under the State or Federal Government who cannot arrest a man who he has reasonable grounds to believe is guilty of a felony.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. If I am not the best friend of civil liberty, I am at least a good one though an humble one. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] need not plant himself on any argument in reference to the arrest of a felon.

What is the amendment which is proposed? It is proposed that if an officer arrests a party guilty of illicit distilling, and shall fail to take him at once to the nearest judicial officer for examination, then that officer shall be subject to a fine. Now I can tell the gentleman that a civil suit against one of these marshals is worth just about as much as a suit against the wind. There is a provision that authorizes a marshal to remove a civil suit to the circuit court of the United States, and compel a citizen to go to a place where he will be under onerous charges and expenses to prosecute his suit. Now these marshals will not take a man when he arrests him to the nearest officer unless you affix a penalty such as will compel him to do it. He will take him to some man who is a relative of the ring, and who will put the man in jail in default of a large bond. That is the reason these marshals should be held to a penalty.

The reason why I want an appeal is that there are decisions standing upon the record in the gentleman's own judicial circuit against citizens of Virginia; and under the ruling of one judge they have been incarcerated in the penitentiary, and under the rulings of another judge they have been acquitted for the very same grade of offense. That is the history of that beloved but depleted old Commonwealth; that is the way these laws are executed there.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RANDOLPH] has well said that this has been productive of more evil than all the other laws in force among us. Now if it is right to have a penalty against the citizen I conclude it is proper to apply it to the officers. I ask the gentleman when he became the particular champion of the rights of United States marshals so as to take the penalty off them.

Mr. TUCKER. I will simply say to the gentleman that he need not "tear a passion to tatters and split the ears of groundlings;" for there are none here. When the gentleman makes an apparently personal attack on me for being the special champion of United States marshals, I think he knows me well enough to know that such an imputation is entirely unjust.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I simply asked him when he become an apologist or champion of United States marshals.

Mr. TUCKER. And when the gentleman asked when I became that, it was an imputation that I had become it. I need no vindication on that point. The law of arrest under this bill is the common law of England and of this country, under both State and Federal jurisdiction.

I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman inflicting fine or imprisonment upon a marshal who makes an illegal arrest; none in the world. I simply meant to show that the marshal is at any rate liable to civil suit at the instance of any party who has been injured by his action.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman does not pretend to say that under the law of this country the officer can arrest without warrant?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. For a statutory offense?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. What, then, is the meaning of the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution?

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I beg to differ with my colleague, [Mr. TUCKER,] and to say that outside of cities where police regulations prevail the law as the gentleman states it in relation to misdemeanor is not the law of Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman says "outside of the police regulations of cities." Now, I would like to know how the night-watch or the police of a city get any larger power over the rights of citizens than officers of the law elsewhere.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. By the ordinances of the city government.

Mr. TUCKER. "The ordinances of the city government!" Where does the city government get authority to make such ordinances? The municipality is the creature of the State power, and how can it have any larger power than its creator?

Now, sir, I speak of what I have thought about and examined to some extent; and I say that by the common law, as administered to-day by the British courts in England, where the personal liberty is as well protected as it is anywhere on the face of God's earth—and I say it to the glory of old England—a citizen may be arrested and taken before a judicial officer without warrant to be tried. Does the gentleman mean to say that when a man shoots another down in the street the sheriff who sees him do it and sees the offender start to go away has no right to arrest him in order to take him before a magistrate? Why, sir, any citizen can do so.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Will the gentleman let me state my own proposition? I do not want him to set it up for me and then knock it down. I say that for a misdemeanor no officer in the land has a right to arrest without warrant after the act is committed and the parties separated, and for felony no officer, any more than a private individual, has the right to arrest without warrant except when the felony was committed in his view; if committed outside of his view he cannot arrest except upon information and by warrant only upon his own peril, and if the suspected party turns out to be innocent the officer without warrant is liable.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman state the difference between a felony and a misdemeanor?

Mr. PRIDEMORE. The law of the State of Virginia recognizes that difference distinctly.

Mr. TUCKER. Of course everybody knows that there is a difference between felony and misdemeanor; but is there a difference between felony and misdemeanor as to the power of arrest?

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I say there is.

Mr. TUCKER. Then an officer can say to a man whom he sees commit an offense, "You are not guilty of a felony, but only of a misdemeanor, so I may not arrest you; if you were guilty of felony, I might."

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I say that if the officer arrests a party without warrant upon the idea that he has been guilty of felony he does so at his own peril. If the offense is merely a misdemeanor he has no right to arrest without warrant.

Mr. TUCKER. Then a ministerial officer has the right to judge of the character of the offense, and arrest a man or not, just as he chooses. That is the proposition, as I understand it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PRIDEMORE, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. MILLS, to strike out the ninth section.

Mr. MILLS. The ninth section of the bill, which I propose to strike out, confers upon United States marshals and their deputies the power to seize at their own discretion the person of any citizen of the Republic and keep him in confinement, or take him before some court, without any charge being specified against him. Now the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] as we all know, is a very fine lawyer; and he says that a marshal or a sheriff has the right to seize a citizen of this Republic without warrant, without oath or affirmation charging him with the commission of a crime, and deprive him of his liberty.

Why, sir, the doctrine which the gentleman assails in announcing such a proposition is as old as the English language. It is no new thing with the English-speaking people. They have shed an immense amount of blood in resisting the command of arbitrary power to seize the subjects of Great Britain and incarcerate them without warrant. This is a power that was denied to the Crown of Great Britain. When the attempt has been made to exercise it, it has shaken the throne of Great Britain from center to circumference. Why, sir, in 1760, as will be remembered, the government of Great Britain was shaken by the attempt to seize the person of Wilkes without warrant and put him upon trial.

And, sir, when our fathers came to make the charter for the government of themselves and their children, when they put no interdiction against the exercise of this power in that charter, it was returned by the States with this amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

This the highest law of the land declares that two things shall precede the arrest: the oath or affirmation of the party charging him with the commission of the offense and the warrant of the officer of law issued upon that oath or affirmation to seize the body of the party so charged. Yet notwithstanding that is the highest law of this land we are told it is lawful for any officer of the Government to seize any citizen and to deprive him without due process of law of his property or of the freedom of his person. No tyrant went further than this. Indeed, sir, the whole of the internal-revenue system is but a bill of attainder against the persons, houses, papers, and effects of our citizens. You cannot get a writ of injunction to restrain an internal-revenue officer from seizing your property. If he comes and demands $50,000 taxes, or all you have, there is no power under the law of this internal-revenue system which can restrain that officer from executing his will—it is not the law, but executing his will or his rights given in the law to seize the property of the citizen. They are empowered to go and take into their custody the property and persons of citizens, to seize them and hold them at their will, to carry them wherever they please and keep them as long as they wish and blackmail them to whatever extent they choose. That is the splendid revenue system we are imposing upon the citizens of the United States. I am sorry, sir, to see that our people are so fallen that we cannot put in an amendment in vindication of the right of the citizen to be secure in his person and property.

Mr. TUCKER. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I will not be considered as trespassing upon the time of the House in attempting to vindicate myself against the charges of my friend from Texas and my colleague from Virginia. My friend from Texas quotes the Constitution of the United States, with which we are familiar, and you will find that there is nothing in that which impugns the proposition of arrest without warrant. The party who drafted that clause drew it from the famous resolutions of Parliament at the time that Lord Chief-Justice Pratt afterward Lord Camden, in 1763 or 1764, decided the case involving the publication of the North Briton. That provision was copied, I think, by George Mason into the bill of rights of Virginia, (which was adopted before the Declaration of Independence,) and embodied in the amendments to the Federal Constitution. What is it?

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.

Against unreasonable searches and seizures, leaving the question as to what are unreasonable searches and seizures to the common-law doctrine. It then goes on:

And no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

That is clear, but there is nothing said about the arrest of the party in order to take him under judicial consideration; not a word. The whole question turns back upon what is the common law. I assert again (and if this debate continues long enough I will show to my friend from Texas the decision) that Lord Tenterden in the case I have already mentioned decided the seizure and arrest of any person guilty of a violation of the law is justifiable by an officer wherever he has reasonable grounds to believe there has been such violation. He is never justified so as not to be actionable in reference to a private party unless he can prove the party——

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Does that include misdemeanors as well as felonies?

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MILLS. Will my friend show any authority in reference to the case I put? This is under a written Constitution of our country. Now, can he show me any authority in our country—I do not ask for any authority in England under the law there—but can he show me any authority in our country where an officer has the right or the warrant to arrest a citizen without the preceding conditions being fulfilled provided for in the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. TUCKER. I have never heard of any question on that subject. I suppose it is the usual every-day practice in almost every country, at least where crime is committed.

Mr. MILLS. It is not done, then, legally.

Mr. TUCKER. If not legally, why, then, has not my friend who is so zealous ever brought action against an officer?

Mr. MILLS. Because such things never occurred in my country.

Mr. TUCKER. Why, does the gentleman mean to say that a man who sees another commit murder and sees him attempting to escape would not be justified in attempting to arrest him? No action would lie in such a case as that if he saw him commit the offense.

Mr. MILLS. If he has the discretion to arrest when he sees the commission of a crime, he must have the discretion to arrest though he does not see the crime committed.

Mr. TUCKER. This particular provision applies to the case of—

. Any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States within the judicial district for which he is appointed, when he shall find any person in the act of—

Committing the crime. Now I trust I have vindicated myself on that point. I have no objection to the amendment of my colleague from Virginia to punish a marshal. But the best punishment I think is to have him amenable to private action.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. My colleague I think somewhat mistakes my position. I never contended that the officer cannot arrest a felon. There is a distinction between a felony and a misdemeanor.

Mr. TUCKER. In Virginia you never arrest a man for a misdemeanor.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I do not know that.

Mr. TUCKER. I would like the gentleman to show me where is the right to arrest for a misdemeanor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Virginia behind me [Mr. TUCKER] has been the ordinary doctrine established in all those regions where the English common law has prevailed; but it has not been the doctrine that has universally prevailed, by any means. The gentleman from Virginia on my left [Mr. PRIDEMORE] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] could cite a case that fully sustains their views. It is where a celebrated magistrate, as celebrated now throughout the world as Lord Mansfield or any of the great judicial authorities of England, laid down the doctrine precisely as those gentlemen understand the doctrine ought to be. In giving authority to marshals or watchmen he says: "You ma command any man to stand in the king's name." "But what if he will not stand?" "Let him go; take no note of him, and thank God you are rid of a knave." [Laughter.] That is precisely a case in point. These gentlemen would execute our laws on the Dogberry plan; instead of punishing the criminal they would punish the officer. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MILLS to strike out the section, it was not agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I offer the following amendment as an additional section after section 9:

That section 1046 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to strike out from the second line of the section the words "the revenue laws or;" so that the same shall refer to and include only violators of the laws on the subject of the slave trade.

Mr. BURCHARD. Before the gentleman proceeds, I desire to make the point of order that this is a general provision relating to limitations of actions embraced in the judiciary act.

Mr. STEELE. Am I entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the point of order insisted on now?

Mr. BURCHARD. Just as the gentleman from North Carolina prefers. If the gentleman prefers to make his remarks before the point of order is decided, I have no objection.

Mr. STEELE. I am perfectly indifferent which course is pursued.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the amendment would be in order anywhere I believe it would be in order here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If section 1046 of the Revised Statutes relates to prosecutions for violating the internal-revenue laws, which the Chair believes it does, then this amendment is undoubtedly in order.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, it will be apparent to every gentleman who examines the statute to which my amendment refers, and to which certainly it is germane, that that statute relates to the limitations on the power of the Government to institute prosecutions for the violation of its laws. It will be seen that one of the sections makes all offenses against the criminal laws of the country, except willful murder, barred by statute after the lapse of three years. Even treason, piracy, any felony which can be committed against the United States, is barred by the operation of the statute after a lapse of three years. All offenses of a minor character, all misdemeanors declared so to be by statute—for I believe nobody has ever been able to draw exactly the line as to what a felony is, except that that is a felony which is declared to be such by statute, (that is as far as I can understand it, and I do not believe anybody else understands any more about it than just that)—all misdemeanors which may be committed against the laws of the United States are barred by statute after the lapse of two years, except the offenses specified in section 1046, which are offenses against the revenue laws of the country and against the laws relating to the slave trade. The latter laws are almost entirely nugatory now in this country.

Now, the purpose of my amendment is to put offenses of the class of misdemeanors upon the same plane. I see no reason on earth why a longer time should be required to elapse before the operation of the statute of limitations upon alleged violations of the revenue laws than in reference to other offenses of a similar character which may be committed against the laws of the United States. I have failed to see or hear of any substantial reason which justifies that very remarkable difference.

What the reasons are which exist for the interposition of the law in declaring a statute of limitations I shall not attempt to discuss before a House where so many gentlemen belong to the legal profession. And now, in connection with that matter, I will state that my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] on Saturday was extremely anxious to know the name of the judge in North Carolina who insisted on the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States to try persons who are charged with offenses against the criminal laws of the State. I can tell him the name of that judge. He is the judge of the western judicial district of the State of North Carolina. One of our ablest, most brilliant, and most fearless judges has endeared himself to the hearts of the people of North Carolina by his unflinching effort to maintain the integrity and power of the courts of North Carolina against Federal encroachment.

I allude to Hon. David Schenck; and the action of the judge claiming jurisdiction has been sustained by the supreme court of our State in a case which was recently before it, their opinion being founded, as I learn, upon section 643 of the Revised Statutes. Now, this action of which we complain has been a perfect outrage upon our people; and will continue to be so while this extraordinary power exists under the statutes of the United States. That statute was read here at the instance of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RIDDLE] on Saturday.

In connection with this amendment, I will say that I hope the House of Representatives will establish the principle in the law of this country that all misdemeanors shall stand on the same ground, and that every violation of the criminal law of this country of that particular character shall be treated precisely alike. Having said that, and having said all that I choose to say on this subject, I will not speak further.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the law had been as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STEELE,] then the most stupendous frauds connected with the distillation could never have been punished. The great frauds in the cities of Chicago and Saint Louis, which startled the whole country, were not discovered and prosecutions were not commenced until more than two years had elapsed after the frauds had been committed. My recollection is (and I speak from memory, not having looked up the matter) that when the frauds were unearthed it was found that they went back to 1871 and 1872.

The reason why the statute of limitations should not be the same in these as in other cases is that these frauds are perpetrated secretly, it may be in connivance with some of the subordinate officers of the Government, and they are not discovered for a long time. Therefore those whose duty it is to prosecute for offenses against the internal-revenue laws are not for a long time advised of those offenses, and the statute of limitations as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] would bar any action.

You could not have punished what is called the whisky ring for these offenses against the revenue laws of the United States had that limitation been in force. I think we would make a great mistake now if we should shorten the limitation to the period proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

It may be that in cases of open, notorious violations of the law, those that are patent and visible to all, there should be some limitation. But you cannot make a general provision limiting prosecutions for offenses against the internal-revenue laws to two years without finding that scores of the greatest offenders against the revenue and even good order of the Government will escape through that limitation. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. STEELE. The argument used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] goes entirely too far. According to his argument it is perfectly clear that the statute of limitations ought to be extended rather than restricted. Why should the Congress of the United States declare offenses against the revenue laws to be of much graver character than the offenses against the liberty of the citizen and the existence of the Government itself?

As I have already stated, in the case of treason, piracy, and all the other felonies, the limitation is three years; and yet the gentleman desires to have offenses against the revenue laws of the country made higher crimes in that respect than those felonies.

Although men may escape by a restriction of the period under the statutes of limitation, that will occur whatever your limitation may be. It is the duty of the persons who are charged with prying out the violations of the revenue laws to exercise proper zeal and diligence. There is no reason on earth why a man may be brought up to answer for a charge of this character after four or five years have elapsed, when perhaps he is not otherwise than merely technically guilty of the offense, and all the evidence he could have furnished in vindication of himself may have passed away into oblivion. That is all wrong. The principle of my amendment is absolutely right and I trust the House of Representatives will vindicate it.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. STEELE, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 10. That section 1046, chapter 16, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to strike out from the second line thereof the words "the revenue laws or;" so that the same shall refer to and include only violations of the laws on the subject of the slave trade.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 60.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend section 9 by adding the proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That so much of section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as applies to the removal of civil suits or criminal prosecutions against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BURCHARD. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURCHARD. Section 643, which the gentleman proposes to amend, is a section of the Judiciary act, relating to the removal of suits from State courts to United States courts.

Mr. VANCE. The section of this bill to which I propose my amendment also proposes to amend sections that relate to the judiciary law. This particular section of the Revised Statutes which I propose to amend has relation to officers in the discharge of their duties under the revenue laws. I think the point of order does not hold good. I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this very section of the bill proposes to amend sections 1014, 1015, and 1016 of the Judiciary act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment now offered is quite different from the one offered on Saturday last, which the Chair ruled out of order, inasmuch as it is simply an attempt to make a change in the law so far as it relates to suits and criminal prosecutions against internal-revenue officers. The Chair thinks, therefore, that this amendment is in order.

Mr. VANCE. The object of this amendment is to prevent the removal of suits against an officer for violation of the law while in the discharge of his duty as a revenue officer, especially when he is charged with the offense of homicide. I understand that the Judiciary Committee of this House have agreed to a bill making a provision of this kind; and I think it very proper. The section of the Revised Statutes proposed to be amended is section 643. Under the rulings of the judges in many of the States where Federal officers in the discharge of their duty have taken life and have been put upon trial in the State courts, the suits have been removed from the State courts having jurisdiction and the cases have been tried in the Federal courts; and, strange as it may seem, in cases of this kind the prosecuting officer of the United States, instead of prosecuting the criminal, has defended him. In many instances the defendants have been allowed to go free when it was believed they were guilty. Many hardships have occurred in connection with this matter, and much opposition to the internal-revenue laws has thus been created.

I will state an instance that occurred in my own district. A man living there was arrested upon a charge of violating the internal-revenue laws. He went before the proper officers and effected a compromise. After that compromise was agreed upon he went home, and after he had been there some days, notwithstanding the compromise that had been entered into, under which he was to pay the sum of $200, the officer went to him in the field where he was working. The process had been improperly issued. The citizen, who had his gun in his hands, inquired of the officer in a friendly way: "Have you anything against me? Have you any process for my arrest?" The officer answered "I have none." The citizen then dropped his gun, an ordinary rifle used for hunting purposes. He dropped his gun by his side and turned his eyes away. The officer of the law drew his pistol and shot the man dead. A prosecution was begun in the courts of the State of North Carolina for the crime, but the case was removed to the United States court; and I am credibly informed that on the trial there the judge charged the jury that if the officer of the law had a belief in his mind that the man would resist he had a right to take his life. Under that ruling the man was acquitted. The widow of the man who thus lost his life applied for the restoration of the $200 which had been paid under the compromise; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue decided that under the law he had no authority to return the money.

Now, sir, to take a man's life is not a violation of the internal-revenue laws, but a violation of the laws of the State, for which the offender ought to be tried in the State courts. I think that the time has come when the line of policy in this respect ought to be changed. Is human life so cheap that men may take it and escape with impunity? Gentlemen have declared on this floor their sympathy with the officers of the law; there ought also to be sympathy for the citizen whose rights are trampled down. I think that the officer of the law ought to be protected when engaged in the proper discharge of his duty; but surely the citizen ought to be protected in his rights; and I believe the proper place for the trial of offenses of this kind is in the State courts, because it is the law of the State that is violated.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Speaker, those who have the curiosity to glance through the statutes of the United States upon this subject will find that, after the passage of the judiciary act, among the first provisions enlarging its operation was the act providing for the transfer of suits from the State courts to the United States courts in the cases of revenue officers; first, as to civil causes and afterward as to criminal prosecutions. Now, if we will divest ourselves of passion and calmly inquire for the reason of this, we shall find that it was a reason founded upon necessity and the demands of public justice. As a rule, a national court is better calculated to administer national laws than a State court.

Mr. VANCE. Does the gentleman consider murder, for instance, a violation of national law?

Mr. HANNA. I will come to that view of the question. A judge appointed to administer the law in a national court may be fairly assumed to be better qualified than the mass of judges in our State courts.

Now the revenue officers are charged with the administration of national law; and if this or that man complains that those officers in the discharge of their duties have exceeded the line marked out by the statute, I say no court is better qualified to administer the law in such a case than a national court; and there may be cases (I do not say that there are) where the administration of public justice requires that a national court should intervene. If the case is to be tried by a jury, the jury in the United States court is not drawn from the locality immediately affected by the excitement, but from the State at large. The judge himself will not be so likely to be affected by local influence as the judge residing in the immediate locality. Thus justice is most likely to be administered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the marshal is indicted for murder, and the case is transferred to the Federal court, who summons the jury?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly not the marshal himself. No fair-minded judge would permit the party on trial to select the jury. Ordinarily in a case like that the judge would make a special order appointing some impartial citizen as a special officer to select the jury.

Mr. STEELE. Is there any provision of law by which punishment can be inflicted on these persons when they are tried before the United States court?

Mr. HANNA. I will come to that in a moment. The hardship of which my friend from North Carolina seems to complain is that a marshal may commit a murder and, when the case is transferred to the United States court, may be acquitted. Now, when a man who holds the office of marshal commits a crime, it does not necessarily follow that he commits the crime as marshal; he may do it in his capacity as a citizen. What are the classes of cases in which a transfer may be had under section 643?

When any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of a State against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States now or hereafter enacted, or against any person acting under or by authority of any such officer, on account of any act done under color of his office, or of any such law, or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by such officer or other person under any such law, &c.

So all this class of cases now transferred to your Federal courts are cases arising under the Federal law where the officer is discharging a duty under that law. This, as a matter of course, would not embrace criminal cases, as murder or trespass, where the man might do an act in his private capacity.

Mr. BURCHARD. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demanded the previous question, and the Chair said that debate was exhausted and did not put the question to the House.

Mr. ROBBINS. But the gentleman will allow me to say a word.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will yield to the gentleman for a minute or two.

Mr. ROBBINS. I introduced a bill, Mr. Speaker, on the first day of this session providing substantially the same thing provided in that amendment. It is extremely wrong, it seems to me, to have one place to try the citizen in and another place to try officers. If a citizen violates the law he is amenable to the State courts, but if an officer of the United States violates the law his case is transferred to another tribunal, not tried in the State courts, but sent to the Federal courts. The people do not like it; it is wrong, and as a representative of the people I demand that the people and the officers shall be all tried in one tribunal. If the officer violates the law you do not carry him to the Federal court, but if a citizen violates the law you transfer him from the State courts to the Federal courts. If an officer commits assault and battery upon a citizen and claims that he does it under cover of law his case is carried to the Federal court.

I ask what Federal law there is in the Federal courts to try assaults and batteries and murders and trespass and the things which these gentlemen transfer to the Federal courts? I never knew anybody yet who could tell what became of the cases thus transferred to the Federal courts where men were indicted for assault or battery or murder or trespass. Those cases probably died there. There is no method of trying them. There is no process for trying them. I do not think properly there is any jurisdiction. The result is that these officers escape with impunity, and the citizens very justly complain that you have a privileged class of individuals who commit offenses and have their cases transferred to another and different tribunal from that in which the cases of the citizens are tried and that thereby the officers escape.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina that the difference is this: when the officer is acting under United States law by executing a writ or process, or in any way executing the law of the United States, he has the right to have the charges against him tried in the courts of the United States.

Mr. RANDOLPH. For murder?

Mr. BURCHARD. Not for murder, but for anything done while acting under the laws of the United States.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The laws of the United States do not punish a man for murder.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the officer having arrested a person is charged with having committed assault and battery upon the person arrested, the officer may allege in his petition for removal that he was acting as an officer of the United States; that as such officer he made the arrest and seized the person who did the act complained of. In that case, I say, the law authorizes the case to be transferred from the State courts to the Federal courts. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. VANCE. The statute says "criminal proceedings."

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. If a man is indicted for assault and battery and claims he does it under color of his office, and it is carried to the Federal court, can you try him, can you punish him?

Mr. BURCHARD. The officer has to show in his application that the acts were done by him while executing the process of the law, or else the case cannot be removed, nor can he be justified on trial.

Mr. HANNA. Let me state to the gentleman from North Carolina that he will find the answer to his question by reading the concluding part of section 643.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is no answer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question, and all further debate is out of order. There being no objection, the previous question will be considered as seconded and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. EATON as manager on the part of the Senate of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, in place of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, excused.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. VANCE; which was again read, as follows:

Add as a proviso to the ninth section the following:

Provided, That so much of section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as applies to the removal of civil suits or criminal prosecutions against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 69, noes 72.

Mr. VANCE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VANCE and Mr. BURCHARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 81.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 93, not voting 91; as follows:

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I move to amend the ninth section by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And such person so arrested shall be entitled to a continuance of his case for a period not exceeding ten days upon his filing an affidavit that it is necessary in order to enable him to procure the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and shall be entitled to compulsory process requiring the attendance of such witness.

Mr. ELAM. I do not think that is necessary since the amendment which has been adopted on motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. EWING. I ask that there be printed an amendment to the pending bill, which I have prepared and propose to offer when I get the opportunity.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. Will any other business be in order to-night except the bill for the life-saving service?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When will the vote be taken on that bill?

The SPEAKER. To-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RICE, of Ohio, for two days, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. OVERTON, for three days, on account of important business.

EVENING SESSION ON WEDNESDAY.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent that Wednesday evening, June 5, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2971) to provide for the deposit of savings in a popular loan, and measures of a kindred character, and that the previous question shall be moved on the bill after the reading of the Journal on Thursday.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I object.

ROBERT PLATT.

Mr. MORSE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 797, for the relief of Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill authorizes the President of the United States to appoint Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy, for long and meritorious services, a master in the regular Navy of the United States, not in the line of promotion.

There being no objection, the bill was received, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening. The session of this evening is for the consideration of the life-saving service bill, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion of Mr. COX, of New York, was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. CHALMERS as Speaker pro tempore.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to order the House meets this evening for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3988) to reorganize the life-saving service.

The bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the establishment of life-saving and life-boat stations are hereby made available for the payment of the expense of the establishment of the stations herein authorized.

SEC. 3. That all moneys received from the sale of old stations and equipments and other material condemned by a board of survey as unserviceable may be expended in rebuilding or improving and equipping stations.

SEC. 4. That hereafter the compensation of the keepers of life-saving and life-boat stations and houses of refuge shall be at the rate of $400 per annum; and they shall have the powers of inspectors of customs, but shall receive no additional compensation for duties performed as such: Provided, That said keepers shall have authority and be required to take charge of and protect all property saved from shipwreck at which they may be present, until it is claimed by parties legally authorized to receive it, or until otherwise instructed to dispose of it by the Secretary of the Treasury; and keepers of life-saving stations shall be required to reside continually at or in the immediate vicinity of their respective stations.

SEC. 5. That hereafter the life-saving stations upon the sea and Gulf coasts at which crews are employed shall be manned and the stations opened for active service on the 1st day of September in each year and so continue until the 1st day of May succeeding, and upon the lake coasts from the opening to the close of navigation, except such stations as in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury are not necessary to be manned during the full period specified; and the crews shall reside at the stations during said periods.

SEC. 6. That the President of the United States may, by and with the consent of the Senate, appoint a suitable person, who shall be familiar with the various means employed in the life-saving service for the saving of life and property from shipwrecked vessels, as general superintendent of the life-saving service, who shall, under the immediate direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, have general charge of the service and of all administrative matters connected therewith, and whose compensation shall be at the rate of $4,000 per annum; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint an assistant to the general superintendent, whose compensation shall be $2,500 per annum.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the general superintendent to supervise the organization and government of the employés of the service; to prepare and revise regulations therefor as may be necessary; to fix the number and compensation of surfmen to be employed at the several stations within the provisions of law; to supervise the expenditure of all appropriations made for the support and maintenance of the life-saving service; to examine the accounts of disbursements of the district superintendents, and to certify the same to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department; to examine the property returns of the keepers of the several stations, and see that all public property thereto belonging is properly accounted for; to acquaint himself, as far as practicable, with all means employed in foreign countries which may seem to advantageously affect the interests of the service, and to cause to be properly investigated all plans, devices, and inventions for the improvement of life-saving apparatus for use at the stations which may appear to be meritorious and available; to exercise supervision over the selection of sites for new stations, the establishment of which may be authorized by law, or for old ones, the removal of which may be made necessary by the encroachment of the sea, or by other causes; to prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates for the support of the service; to collect and compile the statistics of marine disasters contemplated by the act of June 20, 1874; and to submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, an annual report of the expenditures of the moneys appropriated for the maintenance of the life-saving service, and of the operations of said service during the year.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury may detail such officer or officers of the revenue marine service as may be necessary, to act as inspector and assistant inspectors of stations, who shall perform such duties in connection with the conduct of the service as may be required of them by the general superintendent.

SEC. 9. That upon the occurrence of any shipwreck within the scope of the operations of the life-saving service, attended with loss of life, the general superintendent shall cause an investigation of all the circumstances connected with said disaster and loss of life to be made, with a view of ascertaining the cause of the disaster, and whether any of the officers or employés of the service have been guilty of neglect or misconduct in the premises; and any officer or clerk in the employment of the Treasury Department who may be detailed to conduct such investigation, or to examine into any alleged incompetency or misconduct of any officers or employés of the life-saving service, shall have authority to administer an oath to any witness attending to testify or depose in the course of such investigation.

SEC. 10. That section 6 of said act of June 20, 1874, is so amended as to extend the compensation of the enrolled members of volunteer crews of life-boat stations therein named to occasions of actual and deserving service at any shipwreck, or in the relief of any vessel in distress, and that such persons as may volunteer to take the place of any absent or disabled enrolled members of a crew, and who shall be accepted by the keeper, may be paid therefor, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, a sum not to exceed $8 each on every such occasion: Provided, That all crews and volunteers employed under authority of this act who may be present at a wreck shall be required to use their utmost endeavors to save life and properly care for the bodies of such as may perish, and, when such efforts are no longer necessary, to save property and protect the same, under the direction of the senior keeper present or of the superintendent of the district, until the arrival of persons legally authorized to take charge; and for the time employed in so saving and protecting property volunteers shall be entitled to compensation not to exceed $3 per day each, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 11. That the enrolled members of the crews of life-boat stations may be called out for drill and exercise in the life-boat and life-saving apparatus as often as the general superintendent may determine, not to exceed twice a month, for each day's attendance at which they shall be entitled to the sum of $3 each.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to bestow the life-saving medal of the second class upon persons making such signal exertions in rescuing and succoring the shipwrecked and saving persons from drowning as in his opinion shall merit such recognition.

Mr. PRICE. As there does not seem to be anybody here to take care of this bill, I demand the previous question upon its passage?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ROBERTS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think it would be good faith to put the bill on its passage to-night.

Mr. PRICE. I will surrender the floor of course to the gentleman from Maryland; but it did not seem that anybody was here to take care of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I move a call of the House.

Mr. PRICE. I submit that we cannot have a call of the House unless it appears that there is no quorum present. If there is no objection to the bill why not pass it now?

Mr. ATKINS. These night sessions are a farce, at any rate—a perfect farce. We cannot do any good by working ourselves to death in order to get away in a great hurry.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PRICE. I understand that this bill has received very deliberate consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand that this session was fixed for debate only on this bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the motion to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The agreement was that the bill should not be passed to-night.

Mr. ROBERTS. If this were a matter concerning the tax on whisky or tobacco there would be a crowd here to-night; but, as it is a mere matter as to the saving of human life, there is but a sparse attendance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] insist on his motion to adjourn?

Mr. O'NEILL. I will be guided by what gentlemen around me say.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is desirable if any gentleman wants to speak on this subject that they do it to-night, for otherwise they may not have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL. Can we have an understanding that no business of any kind is to be done to-night?

Several MEMBERS. That is the understanding.

Mr. ROBERTS. I confess I am profoundly impressed, as I remarked a moment ago, with the fact that if we had under consideration to-night some measure pointing to a very heavy tax on whisky or tobacco we should unquestionably have a large number of members present; but, as this is a simple question of life-saving, it seems that very little interest is taken in it. It has been said that "the poor we have always with us;" but in these night sessions members of Congress are very unlike the poor; we never have them with us. I am willing nevertheless to proceed with whatever consideration of the bill the House may think proper.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will interrupt the gentleman one moment only to inquire whether it is understood that no other business than this bill is to be transacted to-night.

Mr. ROBERTS. This bill was assigned for consideration to-night; but if it should appear there is no quorum present I presume nothing further will be done than the making of some remarks.

Mr. O'NEILL. I believe it was the understanding that there should be no other business than the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. That was the understanding.

Mr. O'NEILL. And that there should be no vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. COX, of New York. No vote at all.

Mr. O'NEILL. I favor the bill, and I want to vote for it.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, were I to consult prudential motives rather than the sense of duty which actuates me in seeking, by every means at my command, to urge the prompt passage of this bill, I am quite sure I should not consent to tax my physical strength in presenting to the House my views upon this subject. But, sir, I take it that we may all in the weary march of legislative duty, with its political anxieties and responsibilities ever present, gladly turn aside to the consideration of a subject replete with the worthiest and most generous impulses of humanity, and around which the atmosphere of partisan sentiment has not yet been enabled to intrude its presence.

In it, you will find no abstruse question of science; you may vote upon it without a single unpleasant suggestion as to its effect upon your political status at home; it presents no perplexing financial problem; it is not a "southern claim," nor yet a "northern claim," but a simple claim for a common humanity.

The all-absorbing questions of "how to make money" and "how to keep it" are entirely lost sight of in the suggestive inquiry of "how may we save human life?"

In this utilitarian age, when the "almighty dollar" is at once the pregnant hope and quickened conscience of almost every phase of life, it is expecting quite as much as will be realized if we can claim the attention of the public sufficiently long to have reforms inaugurated and remedies applied which look to no other result than the saving of human life. But for the melancholy fate of the Metropolis and of the Huron, which recently sent a thrill of horror throughout this broad land, it is very questionable whether the subject of the life-saving service would even now hold the position of prominence in the public consideration which it does. Let us then seize this opportune moment and seek by prompt and efficient action to comply with public expectation by supplying such remedies as lie within the control of the legislative department of the Government. Having done this we may rest content, as the responsibility will have lodged elsewhere.

It is not my purpose to occupy the time of the House in any elaborate statement as to the history and needs of the life-saving service. At this late day it requires no defense at my hands; it stands on the vantage-ground to which the best interests of an ennobling humanity have already assigned it. Although its days of probation had lengthened into years of doubtful existence ere it received proper recognition, it has at last obtained a hold on the popular heart that has constrained governmental action, from which good results have already flowed, and with increased facilities yet greater benefits may be most reasonably expected.

The service may be said to be as yet only in its infancy. To make it all that it should be will require careful nurturing. We may all recall the date of its birth, but he that can fix a period when its duration should cease might well undertake to assign a limit to the wants of humanity. It was long ago beautifully said that—

> After a tempest, when the winds are laid,
> The calm sea wonders at the wrecks it made.

And so long as the same may be truthfully said will humanity plead the cause of those who ride abreast the storm on the great highways of commerce and contend for their country's greatness and advancement among all nations, in all spheres, and under all circumstances. The American heart will never fail to respond to so noble a plea in so holy a cause. Now that we are all hopefully looking forward to the revival of commerce, and longing to see American shipping regain the position which it once maintained, it becomes us, in obedience to the dictates of duty, to provide such safeguards for the protection of those "who go down to the sea in ships" as good judgment and a wise economy clearly indicate. This Government has done much in this direction, for which it is entitled to infinite praise; but much remains to be done. That which has been accomplished is due almost entirely to the intelligence and faithfulness of our public servants, and to none more than to the late lamented Professor Henry, whose fidelity to duty was only equaled by his modesty of demeanor and the extent of his varied accomplishments.

As chairman of the Light-House Board he has contributed to his country great and important services for which he never asked and never received the slightest compensation and for which he never could have been fully recompensed; but his reward will be found in the tender remembrance in which his name will rest in the hearts of the American people in the years yet to come. To him perhaps more than to any one else are the seafaring indebted for the extent and manner in which our coasts are lighted, until we may now say in the language of Longfellow:

> From the dim headlands many a light-house gleams,
> The street-lamps of the ocean.

And while each light spreads its warning rays afar over the bosom of the deep it also reflects a monument to the kindly heart and fostering hand of him through whose agency it was located and constructed. In this connection I desire to remark in passing that a vast number of clearly outlined duties lie clustered about the important subject of the proper and adequate lighting of the dangerous points upon our seaboard and lake-shore.

While economy and efficiency are always, in every department of the Government, worthy of prudent and careful consideration, yet to seek the practice of economy in these matters at the expense of efficiency would be, in my opinion, little less than an unpardonable crime. Allusion to this question here is both natural and proper when we come to appreciate the close and intimate relationship existing between certain of the subordinate branches of the Government service. The Signal Service, the Coast Survey, the light-house establishment, and the life-saving service are grouped together in one common purpose, each the handmaid of the other, and illustrating in their harmonious co-operation the good results which may be reasonably anticipated from well-directed and intelligent action under a properly administered government. The vicissitudes generally attending political life seem from some cause unknown to me to have failed in casting their blighting shadow over these branches of the public service, and as a sequence we may all point with commendable pride and sincere pleasure to their efficient and satisfactory management. Closely akin to the subject now before the House is the equally if not more important question whether our statutes provide proper safeguards against the unseaworthiness, overloading, defective construction, equipment, age, and improper stowage of American ships. I do not propose now to enter upon the vast field which the mere suggestion of this question opens up, and only call attention to it in the hope that some friend of the American sailor may be found who will give to this subject the careful consideration which it deserves and reap the rewards that will inevitably follow from a duty well and faithfully done. This subject may not be ventilated in the immediate present, but the day is not far distant when it will demand a most thorough and careful consideration at the hands of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate how far I have digressed, and will now endeavor to get safely into port by adhering steadfastly to the life-saving service.

I do not think this subject should ever be alluded to, at least in elaborate comment, without a proper tribute to the honorable gentleman through whose magnanimous efforts it obtained its first small beginning. Hon. William A. Newell, of New Jersey, when a member of this House, in 1848, first called public attention to the importance of this subject and obtained from Congress an appropriation of the sum of $10,000 for the purpose of providing life-saving apparatus for the protection of life on the coast of New Jersey from Sandy Hook to Little Egg Harbor. Although appropriations were made from time to time for the purpose of carrying out the generous sentiments of Mr. Newell, the matter nevertheless languished, and until human sympathy became at length thoroughly aroused by the sickening details of loss of life on our coast, the life-saving service could do no more than claim a most precarious existence, at least so far as was shown by any interest which the Government thought proper to take in it. But notwithstanding the meager means at the command of those who had charge of the management of the service up to 1870, the good results were of such a character and so manifest that the Government could no longer consistently refuse aid to a cause which was nothing less than the cause of humanity itself and whose only purposes were to save life and protect commerce. The recognition which this service has of late received does not magnify its importance; its claims were always just, and public sentiment is only now doing itself credit in rightly appreciating its merits. Measure human sympathy, and you will have taken the dimensions of this subject, and when practical legislation shall have reached the proper estimate to be applied to it, we may expect to see this service attain that perfection which is the aim and purpose of those to whom is intrusted its present management, who have already succeeded in making it the most efficient life-saving service in the world.

The American life-saving service cannot be said to have been organized until the year 1871, when Congress, acting under the inspiration of the intelligent gentleman who still continues, and I trust may long continue, in its management, appropriated the sum of $200,000 and authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to employ crews of experienced surfmen at such stations and for such periods as he might deem necessary and proper. Then followed a complete and thorough reorganization of the service, and such were the satisfactory results that in 1872 and again in 1873 Congress extended the system, and by the act of 1873 the Secretary of the Treasury was directed "to report to the House, at the next session of Congress, the points on the sea and lake coasts of the United States at which the establishment of life-saving stations would best subserve the interests of commerce and humanity, with a detailed estimate of the cost of such stations."

That report was made, detailing the needs of the service as then known, and appropriate legislation was had upon it by the act of June 20, 1874, which gave us the service as at present organized. Experience, however, developed the necessity for additional stations, especially upon the coast of Virginia and North Carolina, and repeated recommendations to this effect were made by the officer in charge of the service. No action, however, has been taken by Congress with a view of carrying out his recommendations, and but for the painful realization which we have had of the failure to respond to his suggestions, it is at least questionable, as I have already stated, whether any increased facilities would now be contemplated.

The disasters of the Huron and Metropolis are clearly traceable, not by any means, to the inefficient management of the life-saving service, but to the failure on the part of Congress to appreciate the importance of providing for a greater number of stations on the most dangerous portions of our coast. In this connection I will read from the official report of Captain Merryman, who made the investigation of the loss of the Metropolis, that which demonstrates more clearly than anything I might say the actual needs and fearful responsibilities of this service.

Says the report:

> The instance of the Metropolis, besides illustrating the detriment to the patrol service wrought by the excessive distances apart of the stations on this coast, also shows that they injuriously affect the chances of a wreck's being reached, with the necessary appliances, by the life-saving crews in time to accomplish a rescue, when the disaster takes place, as this did, at a point nearly midway between the stations. Ordinarily it would have been the duty of the life-saving crew to have hauled the surf-boat or life-car and other apparatus, complete, to the scene of the wreck; a serious task under any circumstances when it is considered that these things, weighing about seventeen hundred pounds, have to be dragged by only seven men, in the impending stress of a gale and through soft sand. But as the vessel was even then breaking up, owing to her unsound condition, it was judged expedient to hurry to the wreck with as little apparatus as could be made available. What was taken consisted of the mortar, ammunition, breeches-buoy, lines, and hawser, and weighed, with the cart in which they were drawn, over one thousand pounds.

This heavy load, the very lightest that could be taken for service, had to be hauled by six men for four and one-half miles over a beach in whose sands the feet of the men were imbedded deeply at every step, and the tires of their mortar-cart, although five inches broad, sank four or five inches. The serious impediment such a road offered to their progress, and the misfortune of the distance laid upon them to travel at such a time, when men were drowning for want of succor, and which, of course, is referable to the undue spaces between the stations, need not be suggested further. These men, besides, were already worn by their long patrols of the night preceding. During the previous twenty-four hours one of them had walked thirty-two miles through the storm; another twenty-four; two others sixteen miles each; and the remaining two twelve miles each. The burden they were dragging over the yielding sands gave more than one hundred and sixty-six pounds to each man; one hundred and fifty pounds over a firm level being the average allotted by standard authority as a man's draught power. They contrived by the most strenuous endeavors to reach the wreck about noon, which they never could have done by that time but for the fortunate chance of their being overtaken when a mile or two on their way and assisted by a man with a cart-horse.

A further point, common to all such cases, is presented by this, namely: that these men, upon whose unwasted vigor much of the success of their service at the wreck depended, worn in some degree by their previous night's patrolling, arrived at the scene of their toil still further wearied by their severe march with their apparatus, to at once engage in still more exausting exertions, which they continued for the remainder of the day, or until the last survivor was rescued.

And yet, notwithstanding the heroic efforts of these noble-hearted men, who were doing all that human strength would permit, they and the service to which they belong have been censured and maligned just so long as it was supposed any person could be found willing to be amused at such chronic "madness;" but there was "method in the madness" for all that. Captain Aukers, of the Metropolis, dispatching from Wreck Station under date of February 1, 1878, says:

> Had they been properly provided, and got there before noon, every one would have been saved.

While the captain may not have so intended, he has yet entitled himself to be justly regarded as furnishing the strongest argument in favor of increased facilities being given the service, in order that a recurrence of such a disaster might be rendered almost impossible. With respect to the loss of the Huron, Master W. P. Conway, in a statement published in the New York Herald of November 27, 1877, freely admits that—

> If the life-saving station had been in operation and we could have gotten a line from her, all hands might have been saved.

In this opinion Ensign Young and other survivors concur, thus clearly indicating the importance of increasing the number of stations and of manning them for a longer period, which is all that the present management of the service has ever demanded, in order to secure satisfactory efficiency. The operations of the service at wrecks which occurred on other parts of the coast in the same storms that destroyed the Huron and Metropolis clearly establish the fact that those disasters cannot be justly regarded as calling in question the administrative capacity of the present management. It is not pretended, however, that in any event such a state of efficiency can be attained that the service may not witness the loss of many a stanch and beautiful craft, with its precious cargo of human life, for which it will be in no proper sense responsible, but for which it will, perhaps, be as unsparingly condemned as it has recently been. But this is one of the many privileges which the American citizen seemingly enjoys, and which is indulged in to its fullest capacity.

Notwithstanding the efficiency of the royal life-boat institution, the loss of life by shipwreck on the coast of Great Britain has been at times simply appalling; as, for instance, the wreck of the steamer Chusan at the entrance to Androssan Harbor, on the coast of Scotland, when there was a first-class life-boat and a well-organized crew at Androssan; and, again, the iron steam-vessel Schiller of thirty-six hundred tons, plying between Hamburg and New York, was wrecked near Land's End, coast of England, in May, 1875, resulting in the loss of three hundred lives; and also the steamer Deutschland, bound from Bremen to New York, to call at Southampton, struck on the Kentish Knock, on the coast of Essex, England, December 5, 1875, entailing great loss of life. The royal life-boat institution was not, however, condemned for these disasters, nor has it since entered the mind of any one that because of them the institution should be transferred to the British navy. But the American mind is eminently suggestive if not always practical. It has been charged that some of the men employed in the life-saving service have at times not only failed to render assistance to the shipwrecked, but have even become the despoilers of their persons, and that such was the case at the wreck of the Metropolis.

While it is true that the fell spirit of the storm seems, on such occasions, to run riot in the passions of some men until they act more like demons than men, it yet remains to be established by the least semblance of proof that any of the gallant fellows whose lives are devoted to the cause of life-saving have ever turned aside either to the right or to the left out of the course which humanity and a high sense of duty marked out to them.

The proof unfortunately shows that some of the succored from the lost Metropolis became the despoilers of their hapless comrades. The spirit which actuates to deeds of this character is not alone found at the wrecks of vessels. It is the like which guides the birds of prey which follow in the wake of every army and desecrate every battle-field; they are present in every avenue of trade, and desolation marks their presence wherever they are found. It is that phase of humanity that gives practical illustration to every principle of criminal law; it may be checked, but it will not be extinguished.

Mr. Speaker, I know I have said some things not exactly pertinent to the subject under consideration, but "out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh," which is the only apology I tender for the transgression. My original purpose was to confine myself to a defense of the bill as reported from the committee, and I shall endeavor now to execute that purpose as briefly as I can.

The bills referred to the Committee on Commerce, namely, H. R. 1920, by Mr. COX, of New York, and H. R. 3462, by Mr. WHITTHORNE, form the chief part of the frame-work of the substitute reported by the committee and now before the House. The substitute is neither the one nor the other of the bills referred, but embodies the best features of both, with such amendments as the committee have thought proper to make. Both bills contemplate a worthy purpose, and have received from the committee careful scrutiny and kindly consideration. In stating the motives which have controlled the action of the committee, and induced it to report the substitute as embodying more fully the object sought to be attained, it will not be necessary for me to do more than amplify some of the suggestions contained in the committee's report, which accompanies the substitute.

Mr. WHITTHORNE's bill assumes that the present system is radically defective and proposes to substitute another therefor; while the bill of Mr. COX is content with the system as it is, and seeks only to extend and facilitate its operations as a sufficient remedy for all existing defects.

The one bill contemplates the transfer of the service from its present management under the Treasury Department to the direction and control of the Navy Department. I freely confess that before I had given the subject much consideration I was favorably impressed with the propriety of the transfer; indeed, I believe such was the opinion of many of my colleagues on the committee. But they, like myself, upon careful investigation, are convinced that the best interests of the service require that it should remain where it is. No reason has been assigned by any one demonstrating inefficiency in its present management, or exhibiting how increased efficiency might be attained under the Navy Department. It is entirely disclaimed that the service could be more economically conducted under the Navy than under the Treasury—at most, that the difference would be so slight as not to merit consideration. But efficiency is what we are seeking here, even though it be at the expense of economy; for no economy can be wise that clogs the way to success in this service. The charge has been made that the service has been prostituted to the accomplishment of political purposes, which, if true, raises a grave and serious question for consideration, and the committee have not hesitated to give it the most careful examination. No evidence has been furnished tending to establish the charge, other than the statements contained in the annual report of the chief of the life-saving service. I read that to which I have been referred, and that no injustice may be done, I quote the whole statement. It will be found on pages 33, 34, and 35 of the report for 1877, and is as follows:

> The condition of district No. 5 the board of examiners found quite unsatisfactory. Of the eight keepers examined five were incompetent, and more than one-fifth of the surfmen were unqualified for their duties. At many places evidences of neglect and indifference were abundant, and the new apparatus in some cases had not been arranged and put in order for use, although it had been for some time at the stations.
> The board endeavored to impress the keepers and crews with a full sense of the grave responsibilities resting upon them, and to stimulate them to efforts in acquiring proficiency in their duties. They also made diligent inquiry into the causes of the degraded state of the district. They found that it resulted generally from an utter misconception on the part of the superintendent of his duties and responsibilities, and that this misconception had been formed in his mind by the efforts and representations of certain small local politicians, some of them holding petty official positions, who had impudently claimed to represent the wishes of the Department, and had contrived, by adroitly practicing on his fears, to secure the nomination and retention of incapable persons at the stations, both as keepers and surfmen, thereby producing a general maladministration of affairs in the district, their aim being to advance their own paltry political interests through the patronage of these parasites and retainers. They had succeeded in obtaining control over the mind of the superintendent to the extent of making him believe that the security of his position depended upon his compliance with their desires, a belief fostered by frequent endeavors which were actually made for his displacement by local political factions.
> The district was one newly organized, and the superintendent had been selected on account of his well-known professional ability, and because he was believed to be the most capable person available for the office. He had on several occasions distinguished himself for his gallantry in saving human life, and had been awarded a medal for his heroism.
> The board of examiners declared that after they had corrected the error of belief into which he had been led, the pledges this superintendent gave and the voluntary exertions he made for the reform of existing abuses evinced a sincere disposition to enter upon a better course of administration; and after a careful review of all the circumstances connected with the evils they had discovered, they recommended his retention in the service, stating that "it would be extremely difficult, and perhaps impossible, to find in the vicinity of the coast line embraced in the district a more suitable person."
> Upon the receipt of their report at the Department it was ordered that the incompetent keepers should be displaced, and that an officer should be detailed to visit each station in company with the superintendent, who showed every disposition to heartily co-operate in the measures for the reorganization of the district. Lieutenant Walton, of the revenue marine, whose familiarity with the requirements of the life-saving service eminently fitted him for the duty, was accordingly detailed to execute the trust. The work was thoroughly performed, and in connection therewith full instructions were given the crews in the use of all the appliances of the stations and in their general duties. In the latter respect it was found, however, that in compliance with the caution previously given them by the board they had so used the intervening time as to acquire considerable proficiency. The district was thus placed upon as effective a footing as could be expected of one so recently organized, and rendered a good account of itself during the active season.

The result of the examination of last year in district No. 6 was exceedingly gratifying, considering the condition which the examination of the previous year had developed, when the stations were found in a little better state, if any, than those of district No. 5 before reorganization. The marked improvement of the service at the stations within a single twelvemonth demonstrates the indispensability of these examining boards. The board of 1875 and 1876 found that two of the ten keepers in the district had no knowledge whatever of nautical matters, one being a blacksmith and the other a school-teacher. A third keeper had but slight familiarity with the work required of him and a fourth was totally disqualified physically. At one station there were but two competent persons in the entire crew. In various instances those enlisted as surfmen were without skill or experience in the use of boats, and there were several instances of physical disqualification. In pleasing contrast to this state of affairs the board of 1876 and 1877 found but one incompetent keeper in the district and only two unsuitable surfmen. This keeper was one of those rejected the year before, whose place it had been impossible to find a competent person to fill at the pitiable compensation allowed by law, and the two surfmen referred to were members of his crew. A person believed to be competent has since been secured in place of this keeper.

The superintendent of this district has been indefatigable in his efforts to perfect the discipline and efficiency of the stations under his charge, and the district now ranks well with the older ones. Its demoralization in 1876 is referable to the same cause which operated so injuriously in the fifth district—the temporary control of its affairs gained by petty local politicians, whose aim was to subordinate the service to their personal ends, their method being to endeavor to pack the stations with their own creatures, without the slightest respect to use or competency. The success of these maneuvers would at once involve the utter ruin of the service; for what stranded crew, clinging to the shrouds of a vessel going to pieces in the breakers, could hope for succor, in the hour of their bitter extremity, from life-saving stations recruited from the cross-roads grocery? It would be indeed an evil day when the wrecked sea-farer could look for help only to the puppets of local politics, where once his reliance was upon the heroic groups of tried surfmen. There is, however, abundant cause for gratulation that not in a single instance have these attempts upon the integrity of a noble service, involving the paralysis of its strong arm of deliverance for imperiled mariners, proceeded from any representative man in our State or national politics, nor from any aspirant of whatever party complexion, for any office of elevation or consequence. They have indeed been signally unconnected, as they well might be, with the struggles of political principle or the rivalries of popular candidates. But, considering the criminal mischief and disaster their success would involve, they acquire a deeper baseness from the circumstance of their having been invariably resorted to for no better purpose than to further the election of some local nobody to an office of no higher dignity than that of town constable or pound-keeper.

It must not be understood that the disposition of these individuals to tamper with the life-saving service has been confined to the locality embraced by the fifth and sixth districts. On the contrary, they have obstructed and retarded the effective organization of nearly every new district. Any public establishment seems to be regarded by them simply as something which may be turned to their personal account and prostituted and polluted for their petty ends. In respect to the life saving service, they would probably consider it very hard fortune to find themselves gathered in imminent peril upon some wreck, swept fore and aft by the winter sea, condemned to look for deliverance to life-saving crews of their own choosing. In such an event, deprived of the hopes of aid from surfmen, and dependent upon the cripples and incompetents with whom they would fain cram the stations, the experience, if they survived it, might teach them a needed lesson. To all who have at heart the interests of the life-saving service, there is a consolation in the fact that the advantage gained by these intriguers, through their schemes of intimidation, assumption, and chicanery, has ever been brief; for immediately upon any news of their success reaching the Department, measures have always been promptly taken to make their labors perfectly ineffectual.

This then is the charge, accompanied with its own refutation. Is it that the service may be purged of its political taint that it should be transferred to the Navy Department? Pray tell me where it may be found that any Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, has ever complained of the intermeddling of politicians with some of his immaculate navy-yards? Yet it has been charged, no doubt very maliciously and of course untruly, that here and there occasionally one or two additional hands have been employed about election time to aid in getting the work forward to enable the employés to exercise the highest privilege of American citizens "to vote early and often." The interference has never yet been of such obnoxious character as to induce any of our Secretaries to call public attention to the subject with a view to the correction of the supposed abuses; yet, notwithstanding this fact, there is I apprehend in the popular mind a pretty well-settled conviction that the life-saving service had better take its chances where it is than in the embrace of the chastening purity which prevails at our non-partisan navy-yards.

Independently of the charge of political interference, in which there is absolutely nothing in so far as the Department is concerned, there are many and grave reasons why it should remain where it is.

In conversation a few days since with a gentleman who has dignified and elevated every department of Government in which he has served, and whose name I shall venture to state, even though it be a disagreeable surprise to Captain Carlisle Patterson, who was at one time an honored and thoroughly well-informed officer in the United States Navy, and who is now the distinguished superintendent of the Coast Survey, I learned that in his opinion the American life-saving service exceeds in point of efficiency that of any other nation of which he had knowledge. Through the intelligent perseverance of Lieutenant Lyle it has extended the range of the shotline to almost twice that of the English service, at the same time reducing the weight of the ordnance used nearly one-half. It has multiplied and improved the apparatus of the life-saving service, and, after careful examination, adopted every improvement which has been suggested, until it can at length be fully regarded as having attained the highest degree of efficiency of which the appropriations for its support will admit. The life-saving institutions of foreign countries are, without exception, in charge of civilians. In Great Britain the chief life-saving organization is the Royal National Life-Boat Institution. It has for its secretary and chief executive officer Richard Lewis, esq., barrister at law. That the chief administration is confided to the secretary will be seen by the following extract from a speech of the Prince of Wales at a meeting of the society held in the Mansion House, London, published in the distinguished work of Rev. John Gilmore entitled "Storm Warriors," issued in London in 1875:

> Half a century ago this institution originated in this city. * * * I am happy to say that the respected secretary, Mr. Lewis, occupied that position in 1850. He has held it ever since, and much of the success of the institution is owing to his long experience, and the energetic manner in which he has directed its working has raised the institution to its present high state of efficiency.

In addition to this the coast is supplied with a large number of mortar and rocket apparatus stations, which are under the chief direction of the board of trade. The board of trade is a department of the government to which there is none analogous in this country, but such of its functions as are officially exercised here find their place in the Treasury Department. It is, in fact, a department of commerce. It has several divisions, one of which is termed the marine department, which is in the charge of Thomas Gray, esq., and to this branch of the board of trade are assigned the mortar and rocket stations.

In France the Société Centrale de Sauvetage des Naufragés is an organization similar to the Royal National Life-Boat Institution of Great Britain, except that its scope embraces the management of mortar and rocket apparatus as well as of life-boats, M. Camille Doré being the secretary and chief executive officer. On this subject, Captain R. B. Forbes, well known for many years as the active manager of the Massachusetts Humane Society, the first life-saving institution in this country, and one of our best authorities in life-saving matters, observes in his work entitled Life-Boats, Projectiles, and other Means for Saving Life, published in Boston in 1872:

> The Société Centrale de Sauvetage des Naufragés dates back only to 1865, when there were a few life-boats on the coast of France, supported by private associations. The present society is mostly supported by private contributions, as is the English institution, and like that it has considerable help from the government in the loan or gift of arms. Like the English institution, it is patronized extensively by the government, the honorary presidents being three of the ministers; the president is an admiral, and the vice-presidents were, in July, 1872, cardinals, dukes, &c. Many notable names are found in the long list of the council. The work, as elsewhere, is done by the secretary, M. C. Doré.

In Russia the life-saving service, which was at first under the direction of the light-house board, a branch of the navy department in that country, is now conducted as in France, with a civilian, A. N. Keoulomzin, as its secretary and chief administrative officer. I read from the first annual report of the Society for Assistance at Shipwrecks, organized in 1871, under the patronage of Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Cæsarevna:

> Up to the close of 1869 only a few life-saving stations had been established in Russia under the direction of the light-house board, which is a branch of the navy department.
> On the 23d of October, 1868, in obedience to an order of the minister of the navy, the scientific branch of the technical naval committee examined a report of the then recently organized French society for assistance at shipwrecks, and reported that in the opinion of the committee the organization of a similar society in Russia would be a true blessing to navigation. The report was approved by the acting minister of the navy and submitted to the Emperor. On November 4, 1868, His Majesty the Emperor ordered the preparation of a constitution for a society to be organized under the patronage of one of the members of the imperial family.
> In consequence of representations made by the stock exchange at St. Petersburg to the minister of finance, recommending the formation in Russia of a society similar to those existing in foreign countries, for assistance at shipwrecks, a committee was appointed in November, 1869, to examine this subject. The committee was presided over by the director of the department of manufactures and commerce, Privy Councilor Boutorski, and consisted of the representatives of the stock exchange of St. Petersburg, Messrs. Zolotareff, Pallisen, Serk, Field, and Kazalet, and a delegate from the ministry of the navy, to wit, the director of the hydrographic department, S. J. Zelenoi.
> The unanimous report of the committee in favor of the organization of such a society in Russia was approved by the minister of finance and communicated to the minister of the navy.
> In 1870 a committee, consisting of representatives of the ministry of the navy, the ministry of finance, and the stock exchanges of St. Petersburg, Riga, Odessa, and Archangel, was organized for the purpose of drafting the constitution of the proposed society. On July 3, 1871, the draught of the constitution, after an examination by the council of the ministers, was approved by His Imperial Majesty. On October 20, 1871, Her Imperial Highness, the Grand Duchess Cæsarevna, assumed the patronage of the society.

In Germany the life-saving service is conducted similarly to the institutions above named, and its chief administrative officer, styled secretary-general, is a civilian.

So also of Austria, Italy, and Turkey, where similar establishments, as observed by Mr. Lewis in his Life-Boat and Its Work, have been organized on the principles of the National Life-Boat Institution of England.

In Norway the life-saving stations are under the direction of Mr. Diriks, the director of light-houses. The service is small, the number of lives saved by its instrumentality during twenty years being reported as but seventy-one.

In Portugal the life-saving service is of little consequence. Our minister at Lisbon, writing under date of February 7, 1877, states:

> I learn from reliable sources that there are no such institutions here as they are understood in Great Britain and the United States, * * * and that for purposes of guidance in saving life from wrecks there is nothing in practice in Portugal that would be of service.

The only point of resemblance between the above organizations and that proposed by the bill to transfer the service to the Navy is in the fact that the inspectors of some of these institutions are naval officers. In this connection it must be remembered that in Great Britain the revenue cutters are attached to the navy, and that naval officers have the opportunity through this connection of becoming familiar practically with the coast and coastwise navigation. Any government officers, therefore, suitable for inspectors must, in that country, be taken from the navy. Besides this, since about 1864, the management of open boats in heavy surfs and broken water has been taught on board the training ships of the royal navy as a distinct branch, which is not done in this country at Annapolis. On this point Mr. Lewis, in his book The Life-Boat and Its Work, says, on page 162:

About the same period (1863-'64) the institution caused most searchinginquiries to be made around our coast on the subject of the management of open boats in heavy surfs and broken water. The result was embodied in instructions for the guidance of those having charge of such boats, which have been widely circulated, and their use is taught on board the training-ships both of the royal navy and the merchant service.

Furthermore, in Great Britain the naval officers who act as life-saving inspectors are only that in the service and nothing more, whereas the bill to transfer our life-saving service to the Navy usurps for the naval officers, whom it designates as inspectors, the functions exercised by the present superintendents, which are, generally, the selection of competent surfmen as keepers and the purchase of outfits and supplies, functions which in Great Britain are exercised by the several local committees of the life-boat institution, local knowledge being properly regarded by the British life-saving authorities as a sine qua non in the conduct of the service.

But, sir, I pass from the further consideration of this branch of the subject with the remark that of the multitude of protests, petitions, and memorials referred to the Committee on Commerce relating to the transfer of the service to the Navy there was but one single recommendation in favor of the transfer. Yet the Legislatures of States and boards of trade of the various large cities have thought proper to give this important subject their consideration, and when they have done so they have invariably protested against the transfer and demanded that the service should continue under its present efficient management. So much then for popular sentiment on this question.

In his annual report for 1876 Secretary Morrill, who had given to the life-saving service most careful and kindly consideration, makes the following pertinent suggestions:

The success which has attended this service since its reorganization in 1871 has been pre-eminent; but the consideration of its rapidly increasing proportions and signal importance induce the conviction that the time cannot be longer deferred for its erection into a distinct establishment, under a recognized and responsible administrator. Upon the completion of the few remaining stations authorized, the charge will comprise the entire coast of the United States and the guardianship of the greater portion of all the lives and vessels imperiled thereon. It will involve the care of over one hundred and fifty stations and the direction and discipline of more than twelve hundred subordinates. The determination and acquisition of proper sites for the stations; the transfer of the latter from time to time to such locations as constant changes in the character of the coast, the growing frequency of wrecks at given points, or other causes, may necessitate; the devising, erection, and preservation of station-houses suitable for the accommodation of crews and those they rescue and for the protection of their various apparatus and equipments; the judicious purchase of their furniture and supplies; the choice of able and efficient district superintendents, keepers, and surfmen, and the constant supervision of their operations; the careful tabulation of wreck statistics for the benefit of shipping interests; the perpetual reference to multifarious sources of information at home and abroad for data and suggestions calculated to further the development and perfection of the system; and the unceasing surveillance of all plans, devices, and inventions for establishing communications with wrecks, or saving lives imperiled upon them, including the practical trial and decision upon the availability of such as may be presented—all pertain to the scope of the life-saving service, and amply justify its formal creation as such and its committal to the care of an experienced and able officer, who can devote to it his undivided faculties and energies.

The legislation proper to accomplish this end is therefore recommended.

The substitute as reported embodies substantially all that the Secretary recommended, and the history of the service since then only verifies the accuracy of his observations. In view of its growth, its requirements, the importance of the interest confided to its charge and the terrible responsibilities for life and property involved, there can no longer remain a doubt as to the propriety of making the service a "distinct establishment under a recognized and responsible administration." Further observation will more clearly sustain this. The year of 1876 was one of expansion for the service. Under the operation of law a new district had been created, five others were in process of formation, and fifty-two stations were being added to the existing number. The operations had thus been pushed over the entire lake coast, the greater part of the Atlantic and a portion of the Pacific coast. It became necessary, therefore, in advance of the legislation recommended by Secretary Morrill, to assign a distinct clerical force for the conduct of the life-saving business at the central office. The expansion of the service above referred to, which of course involved an accompanying large increase of subordinates to be governed, marine property to be protected, risks and liabilities of all kinds to be provided against, and responsibilities to be incurred, made it still more necessary that a proper officer should be assigned to special supervisory charge, and accordingly the present superintendent, under whose care the service had been developed, was designated for the duty, and relieved, as far as practicable, of the numerous details of the business which he had previously discharged in connection with the revenue marine.

More recently it has become absolutely necessary for him to devote his entire attention to the life-saving service. The subsequent growth of the service makes it still more a specialty than Secretary Morrill found it. The enumeration of duties contained in House bill No. 3983 and the grave and elevated character of those duties sufficiently indicate the necessity of a superintendent to be exclusively charged with the conduct of the service. The passage of this bill increases the number of stations to one hundred and ninety-three, which gives a body of fourteen hundred subordinates, (keepers, surfmen, &c.,) with whose selection and government he is charged, and a vast extent of coast over which he must keep perpetual watchfulness, guarding in every conceivable and devisable way the lives on vessels menaced by its perils. Surely it needs no argument, no statement even, to establish the serious, onerous, and vast character of this charge. Its magnitude, its profusion of detail, and its gravity are self-evident. The protection of human life! This is the central fact of the life-saving service, and this is the main duty devolved upon its superintendent. Add, as a secondary but important consideration, his guardianship of vast annual amounts of imperiled property. To such a charge a proper recompense belongs by absolute right, and it is equally dictated by prudence. Every sound business principle, to say nothing of any other consideration, demands that such a salary should be attached to the office of the superintendent of the life-saving service as shall command the services of a man who has given the subject special study, who possesses a high order of talent, and who has the requisite technical knowledge and the imperatively demanded experience in life-saving operations that can alone insure the successful conduct of the establishment. Salaries have always been graduated, upon well-recognized principle, according to the acquirements or faculty demanded, or the human or fiscal responsibility undertaken. Thus to the United States Treasurer is accorded $6,000 per annum; to the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $4,500 per annum; to the comptrollers, $5,000 per annum severally; and so on, all because of the fiscal responsibility.

To the supervising inspector-general of steamboats is accorded $3,500 per annum; to the supervising surgeon of the marine hospital service, $4,000 per annum; to the superintendent of the Coast Survey, $6,000 per annum, because their respective functions concern the safety of human life. Now, both these conditions, the fiscal and the human responsibility, unite in the function of the superintendent of the life-saving service and call for the application to him of the recognized principle of adequate compensation; but it may be said that on no public officer rests so grave a responsibility as that which must necessarily be assumed by the superintendent of this service. A little reflection will convince every one that during the entire season of storms—from early autumn until late in the spring, or from five to six months of the year—his life is one of constant anxiety and apprehension. There is no hour in which a wreck may not happen. The lives on that wreck depend not alone upon his vigilance, his wisdom, his forethought, and his adequate provision of means to ends; they depend upon the trustworthiness of the agents he has been obliged to employ, or the sufficiency of the implements he has provided for use, a fault in the one or a defect in the other being the conditions of disaster; and they depend beyond all upon circumstances which only the Infinite Eye can foresee. Yet, if disaster happen, and those lives are lost, that loss will be, by some, sought to be charged, either directly or indirectly, to the service under his control.

When fatal disasters occur, as they must sometimes occur, no matter what his thought or care, all his successes in administration, all his accumulated triumphs in saving life through the means and agents he has employed will be instantly and utterly forgotten, swept away at once as by the breath of the tornado, and censure in all its forms will be violently centered upon him. You have only to remember the utter forgetfulness of the seven years of splendid rescues achieved by the life-saving service—the rescues, no less splendid, achieved that very year on other parts of the coast—and the storm of popular condemnation and press criticism which followed the wrecks of the Huron and Metropolis on the coast of North Carolina. For both disasters the life-saving service, as cool investigation showed, was blameless. Yet, without pause, without waiting, without knowledge, a tempest of denunciation broke upon the management of the service. On such occasions he must ever expect, and it is in the nature of men and things that he should receive, no mercy. For a French general of the directory to lose a battle when the German was on the frontier meant death. He might plead that he had no powder; the answer was still, the guillotine. Public opinion has—perhaps rightfully has—so much of the Jacobin in it for men in certain positions when visited by failures. The superintendent of the life-saving service is one of those men. He can never expect to find consideration or immunity when death strikes away from the coast a hundred lives at a blow. In view of this destiny prepared for him, the least we can do is to see that there is no niggardliness in the recompense accorded to him by law. This, too, is demanded, and the demand will be sustained by public sentiment.

The life-saving service is one for whose efficacy the people expect and are cheerfully willing to pay. In all the petitions and remonstrances that have come up to Congress from the boards of trade and from leading maritime and mercantile men against the transfer of the service, and in all the many articles that the public journals have had upon the subject, there is entire unanimity in the demand for efficiency and an extended service. I shall not, in making this statement, proceed to discuss in detail the numerous questions connected with and growing out of this subject, which presents a vast scope for thoughtful reflection and earnest discussion; but I should weary both the House and myself with a further expression of my views, and shall therefore conclude. Before doing so, I desire to say that the substitute as reported is in my opinion deficient in one respect. I think it should make provision for the families of those who perish in the effort to save life. This I feel assured, however, will come in due season, and I only allude to it now for the purpose of expressing my hearty assent.

In conclusion, I desire to say that the subject has not in the past received the attention which its importance demands, and it will well repay any one who may venture into its interesting literature. He will read of the heroic deeds of the "storm warriors" until he will feel that the "life-boat" is indeed "a raft that no man made," and seemingly the work of an angel of mercy; for in truth it was conceived in mercy, it has been perfected through charity, and in good faith it lives to perform endless good works. God grant that such may be its history so long as "shipwrecking storms and direful thunders break" on our treacherous coasts, and so long as humanity may need its protection.

Mr. Speaker, I now launch its destinies on the sea of legislative action, and can only wish it Godspeed and a safe voyage.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in favor of the bill now under consideration. If what I have to say has no other merit it shall at least have the merit of brevity.

I believe that the United States Government spends no money with more wisdom or more humanity than it expends upon the life-saving service on our coasts. I favor this bill because it proposes to extend the benefits and perfect the management of that service. It proposes to crystallize into the forms of law many of the excellent regulations of the Treasury Department relating to the service; it proposes to establish new stations at numerous needed points on our sea, Gulf, and lake coasts; it proposes to give a more adequate compensation than has hitherto been given for a very valuable kind of service; and it proposes to continue the system now on trial rather than adopt a new one to be placed under the control of the Navy Department.

Now I have the honor of representing here, in part, a State in which the life-saving service may be said to have originated, where it is better understood, better appreciated, and better managed than in any other State of the Union. The rapid growth of settlements and towns along the New Jersey coast during the last few years and the greatly increased railroad facilities have aided in making the people of the State very familiar with the shore and also with the working of the life-saving service, and when the proposition was made and a bill was introduced here to transfer this service to the Department of the Navy, the proposition was met by the people of the State with almost universal dissent. And it was a dissent based upon knowledge. The Legislature of New Jersey, then in session, passed a joint resolution asking their Senators and Representatives here to oppose the passage of any such bill; and the Legislature but expressed the will of the people in this regard; for the people know very well that no system could be devised that would prove any more efficient than the one now in operation on their coast. The surfmen could not be induced to enlist in the Navy, to submit themselves to Navy discipline, and change, in this regard, the whole habit of their lives, as acquired in their conflicts with the surf and storm. The seamen in the Navy would therefore have to be employed and they are unfitted for the duty.

To contend with the waves of the ocean in the midst of the ocean is one thing; to contend with the same waves as they break upon the shore is quite another thing. The deep-sea sailor is hardly more fitted for the duty than the man who navigates our quiet rivers and lakes. The sailor lives upon the sea. The surfman lives upon the land, and the life-saving service is much more a land than a sea service, as has been frequently demonstrated when wrecks have occurred. The surfman must study not the surf only, but the beach, the bar, the working of the life-saving apparatus under the varying conditions of wind and tide, the currents, the eddies, and the everchanging lineaments of the shore. Thus familiarizing himself with every feature of the land and sea in his locality, he gains, in a series of years, an amount and kind of knowledge and experience that are of great value and which could be acquired in no other way but by this sort of special training. And this surfman, trained in this severe school of endurance and fortitude and courage, when all the qualities that go to make up the grandest heroism are so often put to the severest test and so rarely found wanting—this surfman, as we know him, cannot be transplanted to the Navy, and no life-saving service can be successful without him. It is the part of wisdom, therefore, to entirely abandon the thought of transferring the service to the Department of the Navy.

But the best test of the service is its remarkable efficiency. In a letter received by me in February last from an intelligent and observant constituent, who has studied this subject thoroughly, occurs this statement:

Since November 15, 1877, nineteen vessels have stranded on this coast and not a man of their crews has been lost, although, in five instances at least, their rescue was effected by the service during the severest storms and the most dangerous seas known to the New Jersey coast in a quarter of a century.

The superintendent of the life-saving service, in his last annual report, states that during the year which closed June 30, 1877, there occurred on the coast of New Jersey forty disasters; that on board these vessels there were six hundred and seventy-seven persons, and that all but ten were saved. Seven of these consisted of a captain and a crew of six, who were at sea in a rotten vessel, which went to pieces almost as soon as it struck. The other three were part of a boat's crew who attempted to reach the shore from the wrecked Amerique, and who would doubtless have been saved if they had remained on the wreck, as the surfmen signaled them to do. So that the record of the life-saving service on the New Jersey coast during the past year has been one of almost entire and absolute success.

The service has been subjected to much hostile criticism in consequence of the great loss of life attending the disasters to the Huron and the Metropolis on the coast of North Carolina. But the Huron struck on the 24th of November, a week before the time when the service is put into operation on that coast. The life-saving stations being closed, of course no adequate aid could be rendered. But this was no fault of the system. The Government is behind the system, and is alone responsible for insufficient appropriations. The point where the disaster to the Metropolis occurred was so remote from the station that no aid could be furnished in time; but that was no fault of the service, but the fault of the Government in establishing stations so distant from each other. I have no hesitation in saying that if those disasters had occurred on the New Jersey coast there is every probability that every life would have been saved.

And my only object in seeking the floor at this time (for I knew the whole subject would be very exhaustively treated by the able gentlemen who have the bill in charge) was to call the attention of the House to the fact that our life-saving system, upon at least some portions of our coast, has reached almost absolute perfection. On the same line of coast, where but a few years ago the victims of shipwreck were counted by thousands, they are now only to be counted by units and tens. The change is as marvelous as it is creditable to our skill, our courage, and our humanity. What is wanted, therefore, is not a change to some new system, but a more generous application of our present system along our coast lines. Increase the number of stations; see that the persons appointed to command and man them are competent and worthy; see that they are adequately paid for their service; make the system as efficient and perfect on all parts of our coast where there is danger as it now is in New Jersey, and you will do no more than is the duty of a great and beneficent Government: you will save vast numbers of lives that would otherwise be lost and you will divest these fearful shipwrecks of nearly all their terrors.

Mr. DUNNELL addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, the people along the New England coast have noticed with alarm the movement to transfer the life-saving service from its present management to that of the Navy. From Cape Cod and Nantucket and the south shore of Massachusetts have come to me scores of letters and remonstrances, representing the great injury that will follow the proposed change. Knowing these people as I do, and familiar as I am with the character of this service and with the brave, hardy, and skillful men who are engaged in the perilous employment of saving life and property along our coast, I may be pardoned a word in their behalf.

The dwellers by the sea, both men and women, have a right to be heard on this question. Their sons are sailors; they furnish the crews for our ocean shipping and for our coasters; and it is with natural anxiety they observe any attempt to impair or destroy a service which has been so beneficial to them. The remonstrances they have sent to this House have come with a unanimity unusual in a matter of legislation. They beg of Congress not to try experiments where precious lives are involved, not to consider a few paltry dollars when human life is in peril.

Enlightened legislation during the last half century has done much for the protection of commerce in building light-houses, in placing fog signals and beacons, in constructing breakwaters, and making harbors of refuge accessible. One thing further was needed, and that was some proper method and appliances by which to succor and rescue the shipwrecked when stranded on our coasts and to bring the perishing in safety to the land. At first humane societies, organized by kind-hearted and philanthropic men and supported by individual donations, supplied the life-boats and lines and life-preservers and placed them in charge of boatmen and fishermen, who, without compensation, volunteered at the risk of their own lives to bring the shipwrecked and helpless through the surf. Gradually the Government engaged in the work, these humane societies continuing, as they do to this day, to render such assistance as their limited means will permit.

In 1871 the life-saving service was reorganized and placed practically under its present management, which has proved so successful and efficient that the present yearly loss of life is insignificant when compared with that of former years. The record shows that since 1871 and prior to 1877 the number of lives saved has been 4,650, while the number of lives lost has been 80, in 407 disasters. The record is a noble one, and yet who can tell how many of the 80 lost might not have been saved if our appropriations had been more liberal and the authority given to this Department more generous?

Notwithstanding this magnificent record of actual results, accomplished in the infancy of the service it is proposed to change its management. Instead of enlarging its field and increasing its usefulness, it is seriously proposed to take this service from those who have accomplished all this and to confide it to men who have had no connection with it, who know nothing of its requirements, and who have had no experience with its practical workings. Such action will be an ungrateful return to the men whose faithfulness and ingenuity and devotion have made this service signally successful. But this sentiment of gratitude is of little consequence in comparison with the increased risk inflicted upon our commerce and the diminished safety afforded to our seamen.

It is a pertinent inquiry at this time, what has made this service so efficient? The answer is to be found in the character of the men in charge of the stations and of the crews of experienced surfmen who have so intelligently and bravely discharged these arduous duties. These men are familiar with the coast they patrol. They know the tides and local currents and shifting bars. They know the shoals and rips and ledges, the action of the gales, and the force of the breakers. They have been accustomed from boyhood to buffet the waves. Fearless of danger, they are at home upon the sea. They are skilled in the difficult art of launching and handling boats in the surf and are trained to their navigation in broken water.

The sailors of the Navy do not acquire this knowledge and experience. I would say nothing in disparagement of the tars of the Navy, but it is absurd to claim, fearless as they may be and as good sailors as they may be on shipboard, that they can equal the web-footed fishermen who are reared in the midst of the surf, or the hardy whalemen whose oars are dipped into every ocean from the equator to the poles. Imagine one of these Navy tars, whose only experience in boating is in pulling the ship's gig from a sloop-of-war safely anchored in some smooth harbor when his superior officer, dressed in his brightest uniform, goes on shore; imagine such a sailor off the back of Cape Cod in the dead of winter, in a wild, northeast gale, going to the relief and rescue of the frost-bitten and exhausted crew of a stranded vessel. Imagine, if you can, the graduate of Annapolis, learned in the calculus and the Nautical Almanac, proficient in gunnery and the red tape of the quarter-deck, directing the operations by which the shipwrecked and disabled are to be brought through the heavy surf in the darkness of a thick snow storm and the wind blowing a gale. One of the rude, rough, untutored wreckers of the island of Cuttyhunk would save more lives under such circumstances than could all of the officers of the United States Navy.

I have not spoken, Mr. Speaker, of the comparative cost of the two systems, that of the Navy and the revenue marine. The report of the Committee on Commerce indicates that the expenses under Navy management would equal, if they did not exceed, the expenses under the present management. The conclusions of the committee upon this point are doubtless correct.

But this economic question is too trifling and paltry to be considered in view of that graver question of the rescue of human life from the dangers which hang over our coasts during the storms of winter. We have had sad instances of disaster and death overpowering brave men in consequence of the insufficiency of our appropriations for the employment of surfmen. The investigation of the loss of the Huron disclosed, by testimony too conclusive to be questioned, that all or nearly all of those on board that ill-fated steamer might have been saved if the life-saving station had been open at the time. And the reason why it was not open at the time was that the appropriation was insufficient.

We neglect or refuse to make fair, proper, or adequate appropriations and many lives are lost, and Congress, conscience-stricken at the almost criminal fault, hastens, as this Congress has done, to make appropriations for the burial of the dead. Look at the addition to our pension-roll by the Huron disaster, and then compute how much has been saved to the Government by the non-employment of surfmen on the treacherous coast of North Carolina during the stormy month of November last.

Mr. Speaker, my personal knowledge of this service and my knowledge of the men who so bravely and intelligently perform these duties impel me to say it would be a grievous mistake to adopt the provisions of what is called the Sargent bill. To take this service from the hands of men who have faithfully studied its requirements and who have made it efficient involves a fearful responsibility. The safer policy and the wiser policy is to improve the present system, to remedy its defects and to enlarge and increase its usefulness. By enacting the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, we shall secure these results. But we shall not improve this service by taking these duties from the men who have proved their fitness, working in the wet and cold and suffering exposure second only to that of the persons they would rescue. We shall not improve this service by taking these duties from the men who have proved their fitness by their coast and surf experience, by their brave hearts and their physical endurance, and transferring these duties to the petty officers and seamen of the Navy.

In illustration of the nature ot this service and of the character of the men who are employed in it, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read from a newspaper printed in my district, the account of a disaster which occurred a few days since and the saving of the lives of three men by Captain Hall of the life-saving service, who is stationed near Plymouth, Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

THREE LIVES SAVED—CAPTAIN HALL AND FAMILY SAVE THREE DROWNING MEN OFF THE GURNET, PLYMOUTH HARBOR.

[From the New Bedford (Massachusetts) Daily Mercury.]

About the hour of noon, Sunday, Captain George H. Hall, of life-saving station No. 3, second district, who owns and lives upon the Gurnet, Plymouth Harbor, noticed a heavy black cloud rising in the northern horizon. It came rushing over the sea with tremendous velocity. Directly in the path of the storm cloud was a small sail-boat containing three men. By the time the squall struck the boat the air was filled with a white haze of fog and spray. Boat and men disappeared from view. In a moment more the cloud had swept on. Captain Hall sent his eldest son, a lad of fifteen, to the house for a powerful glass. By its aid the boat was seen to be three-quarters sunk. The mainmast was gone and clinging to the side of the boat was one man, while another more fortunate, stood in the bow clinging to the foremast. Perhaps a quarter of a mile away could be discerned a man half sunk in the rough sea, hanging to the mainmast.

Captain Hall immediately sent a little son of six years to the top of a sand bluff in order that the sight of him might encourage the imperiled men to hold on till help should come. Then, with his eldest boy, the captain put out to sea in a dory. They had a hard pull through the tumbling waves for two miles, when they came in sight of the man clinging to the mast. The captain hailed him, but the man was too benumbed to utter an intelligible word. His hands were so tightly clenched to the mast that they had to be pried off by main strength. He was then pulled into the dory. Another quick pull of three miles brought the dory up with the nearly sunken sail-boat, from which the two other men were taken. They were so benumbed as to be almost senseless, for the water was icy cold.

The dory reached shore about a mile from the captain's house, but Mrs. Hall and the hired man were on the beach with a carriage. On lifting the men out of the boat they fell limp and senseless upon the sand. They were put into the carriage, driven rapidly to the captain's house, and there stripped, rubbed, and wrapped in blankets. Brandy and wine were given, and, after working upon the men for nearly two hours, they were made comparatively comfortable. They were so chilled that a few moments more of exposure would have been their death. Had it not been for the presence at home of Captain Hall's son he could not have rescued the drowning men, for the nearest men were a considerable distance away.

Captain Hall's crew were temporarily dismissed for the "off" months. The names of the rescued men are Herbert L. Ewell and Israel Oakman, both of Marshfield, and Levi W. Benson, of Clark's Island, Plymouth, the only son of a widow.

Mr. CRAPO. It will be noticed by this statement that this disaster occurred during the "off months," as they are called, when by reason of the meagerness of our appropriations the surfmen are discharged; yet the earnestness, gallantry, and heroism of Captain Hall, aided by the efforts of his noble and brave-hearted wife and children, saved these men from a watery grave. And now it is proposed to take this station from Captain Hall, who receives a salary of only $200 a year, and put in his place a naval officer. The people of Plymouth protest against such a change.

In our anxiety to relieve the Navy and to provide places and employment for Navy officers, we must not cripple the life-saving service. There may be a pressure of Navy officers without employment; but the remedy of this is not in capturing a service which can never be satisfactorily performed by them. While our Government ship-yards are silent we are yearly launching from our Naval school scores of young men, doubtless well-instructed in the arts of war, who after a single foreign cruise, mostly at anchor, are forced into idleness because there are no ships to command. Without ships we can never be a naval power, even although by our present system we are creating a surplus of uniforms. But in order that this surplus of material shall not go to waste do not force it upon a service which it knows nothing about and which it cannot learn under any of the training of the Navy. Do not make this service the asylum of the superabundance of Navy officers. Let no desire to provide for the Navy, which possesses many gallant officers and good sailors, but with few ships; let no impulse for economy be permitted to cripple and impair the efficient and successful operations of a service which has already accomplished so much and which promises a usefulness still greater in the future.

Mr. YEATES addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, at this very late hour of the evening I dislike very much to detain the House by any remarks upon this subject. But, sir, I have felt it a high honor and privilege to myself personally to have joined during the last decade in the measures which Congress has originated or rearranged for the protection on the shores of our rivers and lakes and ocean the lives of seamen, and of the millions of our fellow-citizens who go upon the waters. As I know that in the morning the previous question must be called upon this bill, and a vote had, probably without the opportunity for debate, I feel constrained to take this occasion to call attention to some of the reasons which led me to believe that the life-saving service should be kept in the hands of these gallant and tireless men, who within ten short years have made it honorable and glorious—so honorable and desirable a service that one of the grand professions of the country is reaching out its gloved hand to grasp it and appropriate its honors.

Sir, the history of the salvation of life in the storm is not the history of the Army. It is not the history of the Navy. It was the heroic daring of a woman, a light-house keeper—as day after day and year after year, with her old father to steer her brave bark, she went from the light-house to bring upon the rock where she dwelt in the storm the lives she had saved—that thrilled the civilized world and made the name of Grace Darling the name of all that is beautiful and heroic in womanhood.

But, sir, this decade of our history will be remarkable through all the years to come as that in which American people have had their attention called to the salvation of myriads of people who do business upon our waters. Prior to the year 1870 our ears were filled with the shrieks and the cries and the echoes of lost ships and lost crews and lost passengers. We heard of the burning vessel upon the lake and upon the river and upon the ocean with no means of salvation on the vessel and none upon the shore. We heard long before that of the crash of vessels driven upon the stony points of the Atlantic and of the lake coast. There was no light-house to warn the mariner of his approach to the shore.

What service in this country has brought about these improvements, these changes, that kind of life-saving service and organization of which we are proud to-day. With all the fleets upon all the oceans, no naval officer and no naval service ever organized or kept up or managed the light-house system at home or abroad. In our own land, with all the heroic achievements in the history of the country of as heroic men as ever lived, the building of our light-houses was not committed to the naval officers. For many long years that venerable man, whose light has gone out in glory within a few days in our midst, has been chief of the Light-House Board, and around him have been gathered assistants from the Army, from the Navy, and from civil life, until quietly, softly, almost unknown in the land, the light-house has sprung up on this point and that projection of the ocean, on the borders of the ocean, on our inland lakes, until we have to-day a better light-house system than any other nation in the world.

It was our Light-House Board that taught that the light-house must not always be placed on the low shelving shore and that it must not always be placed upon the high promontory. It was for our men from civil life to teach that the mists and storms and dashing waves would hide the lower light and that the mists and fogs which arise in the higher heavens would hide the higher light, and that on the Atlantic and Pacific midway between the high and the low was the place where the light could always be seen and where the light-house for the benefit of all should be stationed.

But I cannot dwell upon that. Our vessels, approaching land and passing along up and down the shores and coming toward islands, could see the lights we have built during the last ten years. We have built more light-houses and better lights than we ever had before. But it was found fogs on the water prevented the lights from being seen, and the ingenuity of civilians found fog-horns and discovered fog-bells which would ring by the action of the surf upon the rock which was hidden even beneath the waves, giving warning to the approaching vessel. They discovered steam-whistles, which could be heard miles and miles off by the vessel approaching in the fog.

But, sir, I cannot dwell even upon those improvements. Those means of safety which should warn off from the shore originated years ago, and have become more perfect within the last ten years than in all the years before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a necessity, as we looked on the river, lake, and ocean and saw the burning vessels and saw victims scorched and burned going down helpless to their watery grave, preferable only because that was an easier death—there was a necessity for laws giving protection to those on the vessels in making vessels more secure, in guarding against fires, in providing means for extinguishing them if they originated, in giving life-boats which should carry away passengers, in doing all the law passed in 1871 and amended year by year from that time to this has done, called the law for the security of life on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. That law has changed the yearly death-rate of these disasters from some fourteen or fifteen hundred within our waters, to the prevention of death of almost every one of our sailors and passengers.

But there was needed something more. With all these precautions, with the light-house to warn, with the fog-whistle to blow, with the steam-whistle to sound its alarm, with the apparatus for extinguishing fires and for the protection of life upon the vessels, with water-tight compartments to prevent their sinking, with boats and life-rafts to carry passengers ashore in case of danger, there was still the power of the whirlwind and of the storm, and the rage of old ocean itself, with which man never has contended successfully with all his appliances of art and science and all the heroism of man's nature and the daring of his soul.

There came to the minds of the American people within the last ten years the thought that with our protection by the light-house, the fog-whistle and steam-whistle, and the life-saving machinery on our boats, there ought to be upon the exposed places where the storm dashes the victims of its wrath upon the shore a systematized organization of the bold, daring, and courageous men who were already there without organization doing all they might to save life. There came the thought that the Government should take it in hand and build little houses along the shore and put boats there suitable to go out through the surf, and pay some little pittance to these men who were willing to take those boats and drag them along the sands and launch them in the waves, to those men who were willing to fire the rocket of hope to inform the vessel that help was nigh, to fire the rocket that would carry a line to the vessel and establish communication with the shore.

The nation undertook the work, feebly as an infant might undertake it, giving but a paltry pittance, a shameful allowance, to the brave surfmen on the ocean and on the lakes who peril their lives night and day for naught and who are paid a paltry pittance for but two or three months of their service during the year.

It was that service which I with many other gentlemen here joined to inaugurate and to organize; which I have seen under different acts of Congress extended along the shores of oceans and away up among my own inland ocean lakes. It has been extended up where I myself in the storm have passed them by, and have of my own knowledge known of hundreds of men who but for these life-saving stations would have been picked up on the beach lifeless bodies. I have myself seen these surfmen there and helped to administer to the relief of the men, women, and children whom they have saved.

Joined to that, and I will touch upon it but briefly, is the revenue-marine service. Both that marine service and the life-saving service, under the management of an humble officer of this Government in the Treasury Department, the simple chief of a bureau there, have been organized into an efficient system for the saving of life. He by his orders has compelled the vessels of the marine service to watch out and go to the assistance of vessels in distress.

I would I had time to read from the documents which I have here a statement of the amount of vessels saved and the number of lives which have been saved within these past ten years by the revenue-marine service. But I will not detain the House for that.

I would, too, that I might read about our life-saving stations on our coasts, on the ocean and on the lakes, the number of vessels and lives which have been saved by that organization.

I will say this: that none of these four grand means of protecting and saving human life—light-houses, fog and steam whistles, apparatus on vessels for saving life, or life-saving service—has originated with the Navy. None of these means has gained its supremacy and all that splendor of glory that has been given to this branch of the service by any effort on the part of the Navy.

It is due, more than to any other executive officer, to that faithful laborer, the simple chief of a bureau, Mr. Kimball, in the Treasury Department. To him this country owes more than to any and all other men for the organization of the revenue marine for life-saving purposes and for the organization of these life-saving stations and making them efficient as they are to-day.

There should be appropriations by which these life-saving stations could be extended along our dangerous coasts such as my friend from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and the gentleman who has just spoken from North Carolina [Mr. YEATES] represent, and some of the parts of the New Jersey coast and along the coast of New England as well as on such points as I know and have passed in peril time and time again from my boyhood on the great lakes of the Northwest. If there could be an additional number of these stations established, until in the night and in the storm these life-saving men could lock hands with each other when a vessel with its freight of life and hope is dashed upon their shores, we would have done well. If we bring about that at this Congress, in the last part of this session, if we will but do that, then we shall look back to it with that pride and gratification with which I look back to the feeble assistance I have been able to render in making the life-saving service as perfect even as it now is. We will look back to it with a pride and with a gratification greater than that with which we look upon many of the honorable things that we have done or tried to do in our congressional career.

If I thought it were possible that these gallant fishermen of the lakes, who without any organization dash out in the storm, as I know and have seen from my youth, and take off from the foundering and sinking vessel the passengers who are crowded upon it, and take them safely to the shore—if I thought these gallant, valiant, bold, hard-handed, but soft-hearted surfmen, who line the Atlantic and Pacific coasts could be supplanted in this service by being turned over to the cold arbitrament of naval officers, could be supplanted by clumsy sailors taken from their ships to rush along the shores and through the waves, I should have but little hope of the usefulness of that service hereafter.

Sir, the duty of the naval officers and of the men in the Navy is to keep their vessels away from the shore. If the admiral or the commodore or the captain or the master or the lieutenant or the ensign or the "middy" only knows that he is away from what he calls the "God-forsaken shore," he is happy. What in Heaven's name would he be worth if you planted him on the land? Why, sir, if a naval vessel is foundered near shore the officers and crew almost inevitably get drowned. I have the record here; and such is the case not only in the Chinese and Japanese seas, but along our own coast. They go down helpless unless the surfmen are there to go out and seize these naval officers and seamen and bring them safely to shore.

Sir, after this service in less than eight years, under the direction of a civilian, the little black-eyed man at the head of the revenue-marine service in the Treasury, has won for itself such distinction, though without means, without proper appropriations, with stations scattered far along our dangerous coasts, I do not believe that the American people or their representatives here will dare snatch from this service in the beginning of its career the credit it has acquired and give it to another.

No man respects our naval officers and our sailors more than I do; but it is their business to destroy life, and the more effectually they do it in their appointed time the more we honor them. By habit, by instinct, by nature, their whole thought, their whole expectation of glory is in sinking ships and destroying the lives of soldiers and sailors. Let them keep their eye on that business and do it well if the occasion ever arises; but let these men who can go through the surf and bring dripping, fainting, panting, dying men, women, and babes, and tenderly through the beating waves carry them to the shore, restore them to life and hope—let these men pursue the calling which without the aid of this Government they pursued for long, long years and will pursue whether this Government withdraws from them the pittance it gives and the paltry honor it bestows, or whether it leaves them to battle with the storm and with the tempest for the preservation of human life. [Applause.]

Mr. BROGDEN addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. PRICE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

THE BARK CALDERA.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 923) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China, concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai," approved March 3, 1859, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that any person or persons, or body-corporate, holding and making any claim upon the balance of the fund usually designated and known as "the Chinese indemnity fund," under the control of the Department of State of the United States, and now unappropriated, for losses sustained by the plunder and destruction, in the year 1854, of the bark Caldera, and property on board of that vessel, may, at any time within twelve months, commence proceedings in the Court of Claims against the United States, in the same manner as other suits are brought, pursuant to and in virtue of the statutes of the United States and the rules of that court; and the Court of Claims is given full jurisdiction to hear and determine such claim or demand, according to the principles of justice and international law.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment: after the word "use," in line 3 of section 2, to strike out the words:

As competent evidence before the court, any records, documents, or papers relating to the said claim, which may have been deposited in the office of the Secretary of State under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1859, entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai," or certified copies of such records, documents, or other papers; that at the hearing or on the trial of any suit so commenced as aforesaid, either party, plaintiff or defendant, shall have the right to produce.

And in line 15, before the word "testimony," to strike out "additional;" so as to make the second section of the bill read:

That, at the hearing or on trial of any suit so commenced, either party, plaintiff or defendant, shall have the right to use before the court any testimony or documents which may be relevant to, and competent upon, the issue joined between the parties; and that the proceedings, trial, decision, and judgment of the said court shall be had in the same manner as in all other cases before the said Court of Claims, and have the same effect; and that either party, plaintiff or defendant, may appeal from the decision or judgment of said Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner as now provided for in other cases: Provided, however, That if any final judgment be found in favor of a claimant or plaintiff, the same shall only be paid and satisfied out of the balance of said Chinese indemnity fund; and if said judgment shall be in favor of the defendant, then such claimants shall be forever barred in law and equity from hereafter making any claim upon or against said fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator in charge of this measure would explain what the bill is, and what it means.

Mr. WALLACE. The bill is to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction of a claim in behalf of the insurers of the bark Caldera for payment out of the moneys paid into the Treasury in pursuance of the Chinese indemnity. The amendment of the committee now under consideration takes out of the bill evidence that was questionable. I suppose there will be no objection to it. The report of the House committee was adopted by the Senate committee and details the facts fully.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that report read. It has been a long time since this transaction occurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WALLACE, March 26th:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs report back with amendments House bill No. 923, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China, concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai," approved March 3, 1859, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases, and adopt the report of the House committee, which is as follows:

"The committee hereby recommend the passage of the bill annexed to this report, giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction in the case, the facts of which appear to be as follows:

"The bark Caldera, under the command of Mathew Rooney, an American citizen, being laden with a cargo belonging to American merchants, sailed from the port of Hong-Kong on the 5th day of October, 1854, bound to the port of San Francisco; and having been obliged to seek shelter from a storm, in the port of Keolau, on the Chinese coast, was, while at anchor there, and the crew employed at the pumps to keep the vessel free of water, boarded by armed bands of Chinese, who drove the men from the pumps, took possession of the vessel, and, after plundering her of all the cargo except granite in the lower hold, burned her, and she became a total loss.

"The petitioning insurance companies paid insurances to the amount of $72,512, being a total loss of the whole sum insured, besides a considerable sum in addition expended in an unsuccessful effort to recover the property.

"The petitioners took all the necessary steps to establish a valid claim on the Chinese government for the amount of the loss and Mr. Marcy, then Secretary of State in a dispatch to Dr. Parker, fully recognized the justice of the claim and directed its prosecution before the Chinese government.

"In 1858, Mr. Reed, the then American minister, made a convention with the Chinese government, securing indemnity for this as well as other claims, and about $700,000 was paid by the Chinese government, a large portion of which is still held by the State Department, awaiting the disposition of Congress.

"Mr Reed recommended that the claim of the Caldera should be adjudicated at home, because the evidence could be there most easily produced. Meanwhile under an act of Congress passed in 1859, commissioners were appointed to pass upon all claims upon this Chinese indemnity fund. These commissioners held their sessions at Macao, in China, and to them the papers in the Caldera case were forwarded by Mr. Cass, then Secretary of State. The claim was duly filed with the commissioners, who made a deduction therefrom of 60 per cent., on the ground of a supposed prior damage by sea water to the cargo. This deduction appears to have been made without sufficient evidence of its justice and under a misapprehension of the law applicable to the case, and the claimants had no opportunity of being heard upon the question.

"They were told that the acceptance of the 40 per cent. allowed them would not preclude a rehearing of the case at Washington, but as the act of 1859 did not provide for an appeal from the decision of the commissioners such a rehearing cannot be had without an act of Congress.

"Your committee are satisfied from the evidence submitted to them that it is but just that the underwriters should be allowed to present the evidence which, if they had time or proper notice, would have been presented to the commissioners, to some competent tribunal for a final decision as to the justice of their claim. Other claims presented to the commission, and which were disallowed by it, have been reviewed and paid from this fund. The case of the Neva, which was of like character to this, was entirely rejected by the commissioners, but the claimants, by act of Congress, were allowed a rehearing before the Attorney-General, who decided that the conclusions of the commissioners were erroneous, and payment was accorded to them. Your committee are of the opinion that the Court of Claims is the tribunal by which questions of this character should be heard and determined.

"Your committee also submit the fact that this claim has been paid in full by the Chinese government, and that the remaining 60 per cent. thereof is still held by the State Department, so that if it should be allowed in full by the Court of Claims no money will be taken from the Treasury."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania through what process this 40 per cent. that has been paid was obtained?

Mr. WALLACE. It was paid out of the Chinese indemnity fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how was it proved? Was it proved before the commissioners?

Mr. WALLACE. It was proved before the commissioners. It is so stated in the report.

Mr. KERNAN. The commission sitting in China allowed 40 per cent. and rejected 60 per cent of the claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And now this is a proposition to try it over again?

Mr. WALLACE. It is not a proposition to try it over again, but it is a proposition to allow the Court of Claims to pass upon the question whether the claimants are not entitled to the whole, they receiving but 40 per cent. They were not in Court upon the other question at all. They claim a hearing upon the subject of the 60 per cent. It was rejected without any view of the facts in the case, as the Senator will ascertain if he examines the whole of the facts as they were before the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act of the 3d of March, 1859, provided for a tribunal to hear, try, and determine all claims to this fund in this way:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint two commissioners who shall form a board in China, to receive and examine all claims which may be presented to them, under the said convention, according to the provisions of the same, the principles of justice, and international law.

That the board so constituted shall meet at such time and place as shall be designated by the chief diplomatic officer in China, and within one year from the time of said meeting shall terminate their duties.

The fourth section fixes the compensation. The fifth section provides:

That the said commissioners shall report to the chief diplomatic officer in China the several awards made by them, to be approved by him, a copy of which shall be by him transmitted to the depositary of the debentures, or the proceeds as hereinbefore provided, who shall thereupon distribute, in ratable proportion, the said debentures or their proceeds according to the direction of the said diplomatic officer.

The sixth section provides for returning the records and documents to the office of the Secretary of State. If I correctly understand the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the claimants in respect of the bark Caldera undertook to prove their claim before this commission; the commission heard it, and allowed 40 per cent. of what they claimed, and disallowed the residue. That must have been about the year 1860; it was done according to the act of 1859. Now, eighteen years afterward, the underwriters come forward (although this bill provides for anybody, the original claimants, or anybody else, any person claiming an interest,) for the purpose of going before the Court of Claims and trying over again the question which has been once tried pursuant to the treaty. The convention provided for some commission of this kind, as I assume; I confess I do not quite see the principle upon which we are to proceed if after this lapse of time we are to retry a question of that sort.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to submit a few facts? The committee report that this commission sat in China, at Macao.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is where the law required them to sit.

Mr. KERNAN. Yes; the committee report that to these commissioners the papers in the Caldera case were forwarded through Mr. Cass, then Secretary of State; that they deducted the 60 per cent. on the ground of a supposed prior damage by sea water to the cargo. This deduction appears to have been made without sufficient evidence of its justice, and under a misapprehension of the law applicable to the case, and the claimants had no opportunity of being heard upon the question. They were assured that the acceptance of the 40 per cent. allowed them was not to preclude a re-hearing of the case at Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who assured them?

Mr. KERNAN. I suppose the officers here, because the United States had charge of the fund. I will state one other fact, if the Senator will pardon me. Congress has in the case of the Neva, where that commission rejected the entire claim, authorized a rehearing before the Attorney-General, not a court, and it was reheard. He held that it was improperly rejected by a misapprehension of law, and it has been paid. As this entire amount was paid into our Treasury and is there, these parties ask that they may go before the Court of Claims to have a rehearing, for that is what it is, to see if they can satisfy that court that it was erroneous to have rejected this 60 per cent. We have the money in the Treasury; China has paid it to us. If under a misapplication of the law they had no chance to be heard on the facts, it seems to me to be but just that we should allow these parties for whom the amount was paid to this Government to establish a just claim to it if they can. That I think is the case as it is presented by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of the statute that provided for the Attorney-General rehearing the other case?

Mr. KERNAN. I have not got it.

The case of the Neva, which was of like character to this——

I read from the report of the committee—was entirely rejected by the commissioners, but the claimants, by act of Congress, were allowed a rehearing before the Attorney-General, who decided that the conclusions of the commissioners were erroneous, and payment was accorded to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I heard before; but I supposed the committee might inform the Senate where the statute is to which they refer in their report, so that we could see it; but it seems they cannot.

I know how perfectly hopeless it is to resist opening the Treasury to anything, and so I feel rather conscious——

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say that this is not opening the Treasury. We ought either to pay this money back to China or pay it to the men for whom it was paid to us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another question entirely. We have tried this question on the very point that my honorable friend now makes, as to the right of anybody to this portion of this fund. It has been decided that in the respects that this bill gives authority, there was no damage caused by any misconduct of China, but it was the damage of sea water. There is great force in what the Senator says that this money ought to be paid back to China; but what shall we say to China on the subject of paying money back to her, when having, in pursuance of an agreement with her, appointed a commission to try the case eighteen years ago, they decided against this claim to the extent that it is now asked for and allowed what was thought just of it, allowed all that they thought resulted from the misconduct of the Chinese pirates, and refused to allow what they thought resulted from sea water, and eighteen years after turn around by a new process of ours, not in pursuance of the treaty, and say we will try this over again, and diminish what otherwise ought to be paid back to China, if we can?

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say that I do not think China will complain. The parties could not go to China to try their case and send their papers there. When the question was raised they were not heard. If we allow an appeal, or something by way of an appeal, a rehearing in a court, I do not think China can complain of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps they would not complain. Perhaps they would not complain if we swallowed the whole money. You cannot tell what a foreign nation will do when it is in the condition that China is, or in any other condition. The principle upon which this bill rests is a principle that will apply to every other one of the claims that were rejected, or allowed in part by that commission. What we undertook to do with China was to receive this money and pay it over to the people who were entitled to it in the method provided by the convention. In pursuance of that, Congress immediately, in fulfillment of the convention, appointed the commission and by a public law required them as most convenient to all parties concerned to sit in China. This claim was presented by somebody and supported by proof, and if somebody did present it and undertake to support it by proof he was bound to give sufficient attention to it to see that all the evidence that would bear upon the question of damage by the sea was presented, and upon such evidence as the claimants chose to present the tribunal, appointed by statute, decided against this claim.

Now you propose to try it over again because it has been done in the case of the Neva, if we cannot find any better reason; and then somebody else will come next and propose to try something over again because it was done in the cases of the Neva and the Caldera both; and then when we come to the Geneva award money somebody will come and propose to try over again every question that has been tried where claims have been disallowed by the tribunal sitting at Washington; and so you go on, and where upon any principle of justice or proper law-making are you to draw the line unless you stand by the statutes you have made and do not undertake to set aside a proceeding of this kind unless you can show that there was misconduct in the arbitrators or such gross mistake, distinguished from a mere error of judgment, as would make their proceedings void? This report does not state anything of that kind.

But as I said, Mr. President, I suppose it is perfectly useless to raise questions of this kind for the consideration of the Senate, for our tenderness toward an American citizen is so great that if he, wishes to try his case over again twenty times in the Court of Claims, we can find precedents for it, probably.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator misapprehends the facts of the case entirely. The whole of the claim for the loss of the Caldera was placed before this commission. It was remitted to the commissioner at Macao; they did take it up without anybody to appear before them, and 40 per cent. was allowed by the commissioner's report and 60 per cent. was disallowed, because it was deducted for damage done by the tempest which had occurred before the pirates took possession of the vessel at all; but that allowance was utterly without foundation either in law or in fact; there was not a particle of proof to justify it. We had it all here that they took not a particle of proof before the commission to show that there was any damage whatever done to the cargo before the pirates entered upon and took possession of the vessel. So it is clear that the 60 per cent. that was disallowed was disallowed against a man who was not in court, and was disallowed without fact and contrary to the plain, clear proof in the case.

Then, there being nothing in the law creating the board of commissioners to allow an appeal, and they themselves recognizing the fact that the claimants could come to Congress and have this 60 per cent. allowed them at a subsequent period, they acquiesced and now come to Congress and ask that their claim may be tested in the Court of Claims as to whether there was law or fact that would prevent the recovery of the 60 per cent. disallowed them by this commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what has occasioned this long delay of eighteen years in their coming to Congress?

Mr. WALLACE. They have been to Congress. A bill passed through the House in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was seventeen years afterward. What were they doing during this period of seventeen years?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Vermont and obstructionists to bills of this character, if I may be permitted to say so——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. Taking care of the Treasury——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I can obstruct a raid on the Treasury that is unjust, I shall try to do it.

Mr. WALLACE. It is because they create delay in the passage of bills that are sometimes meritorious, without any such intention I have no doubt on the part of the Senator from Vermont. It is that class of delays which have prevented this bill from reaching a conclusion before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if I understand it, these people have been petitioning during these whole seventeen years and some wicked Senator or Member of the House has found difficulties with it and it could not get through.

Mr. WALLACE. I have stated nothing of that character whatever; but in the past six years this bill has been before Congress making an application in the form in which it is here now, and it has passed the House of Representatives and had full concurrence of the committees here at one Congress, and it has had full concurrence of the other House in this Congress. The claim is a meritorious one, based on fact and law, and the parties ought to have a hearing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was there no petition until within the last six years?

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes, there was before the last six years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What became of it then?

Mr. WALLACE. I am unable to state that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It might be well for the Senate to know how many times this claim has been rejected already, before we allow it.

Mr. KERNAN. It has never been rejected, I understand.

Mr. WALLACE. Never?

Mr. KERNAN. It merely failed to get action in both Houses at the same Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has my friend from New York looked it up to see the history of it, and see what action has been taken?

Mr. KERNAN. I have not. I was not on the committee, and I believed a report like this was worthy of faith. The committees of both Houses have reported in favor of it. I did not go to look to see whether the parties had delayed their application or not. We must trust the committees if we trust anybody, when they all agree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but I suppose you can trust a statute and the eighteen years also, if you wish to.

Mr. KERNAN. If we knew that they had not moved in the eighteen years, but I do not think there is a presumption of that. They seem to have taken their money under a protest, that they might get a rehearing of the matter afterward.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When did they take their money, may I ask? In the year 1860?

Mr. KERNAN. I assume as early as they could get it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that they took their money under protest; and yet it was about fifteen years afterward, according to the present statement, before they moved again.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not understand the Senator from Vermont to state that that is true, and I do not know that it is true that they waited fifteen years or five years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, we do not seem to know anything about it on the House report, and that is just the trouble. We do not know who it was who told them that they might apply to Congress. The Senator from New York says it was an officer here who told them; the Senator from Pennsylvania says the commissioners told them.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not mean to say that, for I do not know it, and I will not say what I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course I allude to the supposition of the Senator. The Senator from Pennsylvania had a supposition that it was the commissioners that told them that they could come to Congress. Well, Mr. President, having earned, and justly earned no doubt, the title of being an obstructionist to meritorious legislation that is proved to be meritorious, because constituents of the two Senators wish to have it go through—which is the only merit that anybody can see in it, and that certainly is proof——

Mr. KERNAN. I beg leave to say that I do not wish it to go through if it is not right; but I supposed when a bill had been reported to the House and passed unanimously, and a committee here has reported it and explained it, I could well act upon that; and the fact that some of these people lived in New York led me to look into the case when it came here and not before. I read the report when it came out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know how much force a bill passing the House unanimously—if we knew that it did—is to have in this body.

Mr. KERNAN. The committee I meant, not the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator to say "the House."

Mr. KERNAN. I intended to say the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether the committee of the House was unanimous, and I am not aware how we are to know that fact, and if we did I do not know exactly what place it would have in a discussion in this Chamber. Undoubtedly the Senator from New York does, and he is entitled to rest such weight upon that as he likes.

However, Mr. President, having called the attention of the Senate to the history of this statute and this lapse of time, and to the fact that the principle upon which this bill goes will open every commission that you have ever had as fast as any claim agent wishes to do it, my duty is done.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have no constituents who are interested in the subject of this bill. I have no motive, therefore, which can be prompted by interests that are connected with those that I represent; but believing that there never was before this body a more just claim than the one that is now presented, I feel that it is my duty to say in a very few brief words why I think the bill ought to pass and think it ought to commend itself to the consideration and the favorable consideration of the Senate.

I want to say beforehand, however, that it is this kind of objection to claims that have merit and justice in them, based upon mere technicalities, which keep us loaded down with these claims almost from generation to generation.

Now, I want to state what I understand to be this case and its merits. This vessel, the Caldera, was wrecked and she was seized by citizens of the Chinese government and robbed. When the treaty of peace was negotiated our commissioners tell us that this claim was allowed, dollar for dollar, in the estimate presented to that government of the claims which it paid; but when the commission did hold its session in that country and came to hear this case, it deducted without evidence, without reason, and against justice, 60 per cent. of the amount of the claim, while the full amount covered by insurance companies was estimated for in the treaty and the money paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Now, sir, does it become us as a people to negotiate with a foreign government, present a claim to it, and have it stated in terms that that is one of the claims which they are to pay, and then turn around and say, after we have got the money, "We will not pay the claim?" That is the whole case.

It is true, and it appeared in the evidence before the committee, that these parties understood, both from the home government and the commission, that if there had been an injustice done, it would be reviewed and reconsidered here. Such was the belief of the parties. Whether it was a well-founded belief, whether they had a right to believe it from the assurances which were given them, I will not undertake to say; but they had that assurance both at home and abroad as the correspondence of the time will show.

This being the case, and they having prosecuted this claim from then until now, and there never having been an adverse report within my knowledge, except in one case in the House where it turned upon the technical ground that the commission had decided it and we should not open it, has it ever received anything else than a favorable consideration? I am very sure that the Senate will do a wrong act if they do not give these claimants a hearing in the Court of Claims, and I am sure they will do a right, just, and meritorious act if they shall do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine who has stated one fact that has not dropped out before, that there has been one adverse report upon this claim, in what year that was?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not recollect, but it was made by the Senator's former colleague, a member of the House, Mr. Willard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have sent for the papers. Does it appear in the papers?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is my recollection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be very desirable to see the grounds on which that adverse report was made. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will forgive me for being a sufficient obstructionist to find that this thing has been bounding around through Congress more or less and has sometimes got a black eye, probably through some similarly evil-disposed person.

Mr. WALLACE. These Vermont people seem to be great obstructionists. [Laughter.] It seems it was a Vermont member who made the adverse report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Vermont people like justice and fair play, and they dislike to see a claim trundling along for eighteen or twenty years and at last slipping through, that does not appear to be founded on solid principles.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to say to the Senator from Vermont that I never before heard of an adverse report until it was mentioned by the Senator from Maine a few moments ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see if we can find that report among the papers. Would the Senator from Pennsylvania be willing that this bill should lie over until we find the adverse report to show what ground it went on?

Mr. WALLACE. I suppose there is no objection to that. We want all the light we can get on the subject. Let the bill be laid aside informally

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside informally.

Mr. WALLACE. To be called up again.

JOHN M'NELLIS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis, House bill No. 4874. The Finance Committee has made a report through the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] unanimously on the subject, and it is very desirable if the relief is granted that it be granted at once. I have been requested to call it up by the Senator from Delaware because the party is from Ansable, in Grundy County, Illinois; and although I do not know anything about the facts of the case yet I have read the report and believe that it is a meritorious case from that. I hope the Senate will indulge me in taking it up, as there is a necessity if it pass at all that it should pass this week.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4874) for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis.

Jeremiah Collins and Martin Hynds, sureties upon a bond of John McNellis, of Grundy County, Illinois, to the United States, bearing date May 1, 1871, and Phillip Collins and Harrison Enix, sureties upon a certain other bond of McNellis to the United States, dated April 29, 1872, are by the bill released and discharged from any and all liability or payment of money under or by virtue of these bonds, or either of them, and from the payment of any judgment or judgments entered thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY TELEGRAPH IN DAKOTA AND MONTANA.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 864) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a military telegraph in Dakota and Montana Territories. It will not take two minutes, I am sure.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment in line 17, after the word "companies," to insert "the proceeds thereof to be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States;" so as to make the bill read:

That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing, under the direction of the Secretary of War, a military telegraph line from Deadwood, in the Territory of Dakota, to Fort Ellis, in the Territory of Montana, via the military posts at or near the Yellowstone and Big Horn Rivers; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to pay the expenses of operating and keeping the said telegraph line in repair, out of moneys appropriated and to be appropriated for the maintenance of the Army: Provided, however, That private dispatches of lawful nature may be transmitted over said line whenever the same is not needed for public use at reasonable rates, not to exceed the usual rates charged by private telegraph companies, the proceeds thereof to be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the said telegraph line shall be maintained and operated under such proper rules and orders as the Secretary of War may direct, for the benefit of the public service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUDITOR OF RAILROAD ACCOUNTS.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate to take up the bill which I have given notice of two or three times and to which I think there will be no opposition, as it ought to be passed at this session. It is a bill to create an auditor of railroad accounts. It is a bill that is considered absolutely necessary in order that we may have a correct settlement of accounts with the Pacific railroad companies to ascertain the 5 per cent. of net earnings, and also for several other purposes. I think there will be no objection to it. It is Senate bill No. 1200.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator from Ohio will let me pass a little bill that cures a defect in our pension laws. It will not take two minutes; and there will be no objection to it at all.

Mr. THURMAN. Let my bill be taken up.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to obstruct the Senator from Ohio at all, but this is a very necessary piece of legislation and I want to get it over to the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. Let this bill be taken up. It is a matter of public concern.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1200) to alter and amend the laws relative to the filing of reports of Pacific railroad companies, and for other purposes.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That section 20 of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, A. D. 1862, and the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, A. D. 1868, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the office of auditor of railroad accounts is hereby established as a bureau of the Interior Department. The said auditor shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The annual salary of the said auditor shall be, and is hereby fixed at, the sum of $5,000. To assist the said auditor to perform the duties of said office, the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint one book-keeper at an annual salary of $2,400, one assistant book-keeper at an annual salary of $2,000, one clerk at an annual salary of $1,400, and one copyist at an annual salary of $900. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred in visiting the offices of the railroad companies hereinafter described, and for which vouchers shall be rendered, are hereby allowed, not to exceed the sum of $2,000 per annum; and it is hereby specially provided that each of said railroad companies shall furnish transportation over its own road, without expense to the United States, for the said auditor or any person acting under his direction. Incidental expenses for books, stationery, and other material necessary for the use of said bureau are hereby allowed, not to exceed the sum of $700 per annum. And the sum of $12,000 is hereby appropriated for the uses and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1879.

SEC. 3. That the duties of said auditor under and subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior shall be, to prescribe a system of reports to be rendered to him by the railroad companies whose roads are in whole or in part west, north, or south of the Missouri River, and to which the United States have granted any loan of credit or subsidy in bonds or lands; to examine the books and accounts of each of said railroad companies once in each fiscal year, and at such other times as may be deemed by him necessary to determine the correctness of any report received from them; to assist the Government directors of any of said railroad companies in all matters which come under their cognizance whenever they may officially request such assistance; to see that the laws relating to said companies are enforced; to furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government in regard to tariffs for freight and passengers and in regard to the accounts of said railroad companies as may be by them required, or, in the absence of any request therefor, as he may deem expedient for the interest of the Government; and to make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, on the 1st day of November, on the condition of each of said railroad companies, their road, accounts, and affairs, for the fiscal year ending June 30 immediately preceding.

SEC. 4. That each and every railroad company aforesaid which has received from the United States any bonds of the said United States, issued by way of loan to aid in constructing or furnishing its road, or which has received from the United States any lands granted to it for a similar purpose, shall make to the said auditor any and all such reports as he may require from time to time, and shall submit its books and records to the inspection of said auditor, or any person acting in his place and stead, at any time that the said auditor may request, in the office where said books and records are usually kept; and the said auditor or his authorized representative shall make such transcripts from the said books and records as he may desire.

SEC. 5. That if any railroad company aforesaid shall neglect or refuse to make such reports as may be called for, or refuse to submit its books and records to inspection, as provided in section 4 of this act, such neglect or refusal shall operate as a forfeiture, in each case of such neglect or refusal, of a sum not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by the Attorney-General of the United States in the name and for the use and benefit of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, in all such cases of neglect or refusal as aforesaid, to inform the Attorney-General of the facts, to the end that such forfeiture or forfeitures may be judicially enforced.

SEC. 6. This act shall apply to any and all persons or corporations into whose hands either of said railroads may lawfully come, as well as to the original companies.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect on and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1878.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes."

THE PENSION LAWS.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to dispose of the bill we had up yesterday?

Mr. VOORHEES. I am anxious to have this matter disposed of. Yesterday I reported from the Committee on Pensions, the committee being unanimous, House bill No. 4422, being a bill to amend section 4695 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The object of it is very simple. Under our pension laws lieutenant-commanders in the Navy are not embraced in the list of those who are entitled to pensions for disability, or their heirs in the event of death. The rank was created after our general pension law was passed, and this is a bill to embrace them in the general pension law. It is very necessary, and the reasons are very urgent why it should be passed now. An officer of that rank was lost in the Oneida lately, and perhaps there are other instances where the claims upon the Government are of very great importance. I ask the Senate to consider and pass this bill, in order that it may go to the House in time to be acted on there before the close of the session.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4422) to amend section 4695 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That from and after July 16, 1862, pensions granted to lieutenant-commanders in the Navy for disability, or on account of their death, shall be the same as theretofore provided for lieutenants commanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We only heard the amendment read. Let us hear the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am going to raise a point of order presently under the Anthony rule, but I will not raise it until my friend from Iowa disposes of what he wants.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to call up the bill (S. No. 1267) fixing the date of commencement of certain pensions, and granting arrears in certain cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that bill explained, if it is not too obstructive to ask that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It will not take five minutes.

Mr. SARGENT. How much does it involve?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It involves four million and a half of dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator from Iowa had better call it up at some other time.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad at least to explain it to the Senate, so that they may have the matter before them.

Mr. SARGENT. Do I understand the Senator to say that it will cost four millions a year?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Oh, no. That is the amount of arrears of pension. If Senators will allow me, I will explain the whole case in a moment.

Under the existing law all pensions granted five years after the death of a deceased soldier, or five years after his disability occurred, date from the filing of the last evidence establishing the claim. A claim may be made before the Commissioner of Pensions, and be pending one year, two years, or three years, before final determination; and when it is finally determined that the person applying for a pension was entitled to it he gets his pension from the date of filing the last evidence on which the claim is allowed. That is the law. The change proposed is that when a party has filed his claim for a pension, and after one, two, three, or more years has succeeded in proving that he was entitled to the pension, his pension shall date from the filing of his application. That is just the difference.

Petitions have been presented here year after year, as I understand, certainly many within the present session, asking arrears of pensions, and asking that they go back to the time when the deceased soldier died, or when the disabled soldier's disability arose. That would cost fifteen or sixteen million dollars. The Committee on Pensions have concluded that if the Government pays to a man a pension at the date when he asks for it, if he proves that he is entitled to it, it has done the fair thing by him, and that the Government ought to do identically that thing. If the pensioner comes forward and asks the Government to give him a pension and succeeds in proving that he was entitled to the pension, then he should receive his pension from the date he made his application; and that is all there is in this bill. If it is desired to discuss it, I have nothing more to say at present. The whole idea is in a nutshell. I think it is eminently just, eminently right, and eminently proper.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the bill contain an appropriation to pay the arrears?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It does not contain any appropriation. There will have to be an appropriation made if the bill passes. I have nothing further to say, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, no objection being made to its consideration.

The bill provides that all pensioners on account of disability contracted or on account of death from causes originating subsequent to March 4, 1861, and prior to June 1, 1865, or any subsequent time, if the soldier's enlistment was specifically for services in the war of the rebellion, except such as under the provisions of section 4709 of the Revised Statutes are entitled to an earlier commencement of their pension, shall be entitled to a pension from the date of filing with the Commissioner of Pensions their applications therefor. In the case of invalid pensioners whose names have already been placed upon the pension-roll, the arrears to which they are entitled are to be computed at the rate of pension named in the original pension certificate, but in no case at a rate exceeding a total pension by rank.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri calls for the regular order. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WHYTE. I was going to propose to the Senate that the morning hour be extended for half an hour longer, to enable us to dispose of two or three bills that have been already up, and that it will take hardly longer than that time to dispose of. Therefore I propose that the morning hour be extended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order under the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order under the Anthony rule, which will be the Calendar at the place where its last call was left off.

Mr. SARGENT. What has become of the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is superseded by the rule.

Mr. MAXEY. I think the regular order should be taken up.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Mr. President, I move that the regular order be set aside, and that we proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to appeal to the Senate, with the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to go on with the Calendar under the Anthony rule at the place where we last left it off. There is a great number of bills on the Calendar that can be disposed of in a short time. The largest part of them are undoubtedly meritorious, and can be shown to be so within five minutes' debate and with much less; and as the session is drawing to a close we might as well devote a part of the day in taking up those cases that can be disposed of. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not agree to laying aside the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his motion for a moment in order that I may make a motion to take up the resolution which I laid upon the table yesterday providing for an hour earlier meeting during the remainder of the session. We always do meet an hour earlier during the last two weeks of the session, and ought to do so now. If we should do so and work diligently, there is no doubt that we can get through by the 17th, so far as the Senate is concerned; and as part of the arrangement ordinarily, we give an hour and a half to morning business instead of an hour. That, of course, can be determined by the Senate subsequently. I proposed, however, to suggest, if the resolution was adopted, which of course stands on its own merits, that the Senate extend the morning hour each morning, unless otherwise ordered, half an hour, when we can proceed with the Calendar regularly, or proceed with bills as they may be called up. I should like the Senator from Michigan to give me a moment to have the resolution adopted. I think there can scarcely be any objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. I would suggest to the Senator from California that we may do so much to-day that perhaps it will not be needed to meet earlier until later in the week.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no confidence in that; but by this course we may avoid night sessions, where nothing is done and where there is always a thin Senate. The committees are now pretty much through with their work, and the Calendar is encumbered with hundreds of bills.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me to have the post-route bill before the Senate, I will then yield for that purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course I shall have to wait the result of the Senator's motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We must first see whether we shall stick to the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that the regular order be proceeded with until five o'clock, and that then the Senate take a recess until half past seven with a view of taking up the Calendar this evening, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SARGENT. I assure the Senator that what he proposes is against a wise method of legislation on every subject; besides, sitting under these hot gas-lights in the Senate Chamber is apt to have such an effect that business is not so well attended to. We can do more in an hour during the day than in three hours at night. We shall be compelled on the appropriation bills to hold some night sessions, and then on account of the magnitude of the interests involved Senators will turn out. For the business of the Calendar we shall find great difficulty in getting a quorum. I speak confidently from an experience of some five years in the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think it must be evident to every Senator that we must commence at once to hold evening sessions or we shall certainly not get through with any considerable portion of the business.

Mr. SARGENT. We can do well when we gain an hour extra in the morning.

Mr. PADDOCK. I give notice that at the proper hour I shall make a motion for a recess.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that my motion be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the pending order be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the Anthony rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope that will not be done. There are a great many cases on this Calendar of bills which have passed the House, and I think by devoting to-day we can get through the Calendar or a great portion of it. I hope the motion of the Senator from Michigan will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 29, noes 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to Governor Hubbard, of Texas, such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the volunteers of the State at their summer encampment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 797) for the relief of Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham;

A bill (S. No. 82) for the relief of Gustav A. Hesselberger;

A bill (S. No. 138) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws;

A bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of Phœbe Henrietta Groesbeck;

A bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes;

A bill (S. No. 998) for the relief of George R. Dennis, of Maryland; and

A bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of J. C. McBurney.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I believe the Senator from Michigan will yield to me for the purpose of calling up the resolution I offered yesterday.

Mr. FERRY. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the daily hour of meeting be at eleven o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SARGENT:

Resolved, That the daily sessions of the Senate shall hereafter commence at eleven o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Why not put in there that the time for morning business shall be one hour and a half instead of an hour?

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That changes the rule, and it cannot be put on as part of the order.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course it can only come in by consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from California.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask to have the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to Governor Hubbard, of Texas, such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the volunteers of the State at their summer encampment was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. WINDOM, ALLISON, and EATON were appointed conferees.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The post-route bill is before the Senate on which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I gave notice last week that on to-day at the expiration of the morning hour I would ask the Senate to take up the bill known as the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, on which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] had the floor at that time to address the Senate. Since then, a conference among those who have been supposed to be friendly to the passage of the bill has been held, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] has given me notice of his intention, when I called up the bill to-day, to ask the Senate to make a disposition of it, which I think will meet with general consent when he states it, which I now give him the opportunity of doing.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, my purpose was to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he so modify his motion as to make the bill the special order for the first Wednesday after the first Monday of December next. I am as anxious as any one to press this measure to a vote and am quite confident as to the result; but in view of the joint resolution passed for the adjournment of Congress on the 17th, and in view of the many important bills pending, involving, as we are informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, $130,000,000, I do not think it proper to press this measure to a vote so late in the session and without the discussion which would be necessary. I therefore make that motion or suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio that he make it.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I move, then, Mr. President, that the consideration of the Texas Pacific bill, Senate bill No. 942, be postponed until the first Wednesday after the first Monday of next December, and be made the special order for that day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw his special order part, and just postpone the bill to that day. Then it will stand in the Calendar of general orders, and a majority of the Senate can take it up; but it requires two-thirds to make a special order, and not much is gained by it, and therefore we ought not to make a special order so long in advance. We do not know what may happen meantime.

Mr. MATTHEWS. My preference was to put it in the shape I have suggested, and I supposed that it would meet with general approval; that that day being in the very first week of the next session, there would hardly be any business matured that would require the attention of the Senate at that time, and it then could be disposed of in a regular and orderly way without interfering with any other business.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the date named by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MATTHEWS. The first Wednesday after the first Monday in December.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There will be other business of considerable importance very likely that will be up then, perhaps of greater importance than this measure. According to the vote that the Senate took a day or two ago, the matter touching presidential elections will stand perhaps a slim chance of getting acted upon at this session. Until it is determined whether it is to be acted on or not, I do not wish to consent to a special order which may squeeze out the early consideration of that. If therefore the Senator will just make his motion one to postpone, which will answer all his purpose, because he can then move to take it up at any moment that he pleases, I shall make no objection.

Mr. MATTHEWS. My understanding, although I am not familiar with the rules of the Senate, as is the Senator from Vermont, is that making it a special order does not give precedence to it over any unfinished business coming over from a prior day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not over business coming over from a prior day, but it might happen that other business of great importance would not be taken up the very first day or the second day of the session and then this special order would stand at the head so that, although the Senate could displace it by a vote undoubtedly, still Senators might not like to do that. I think that all the Senator ought to ask is that his bill be postponed to a particular day, and then leave it to the Senate on the first day of its meeting and the next to determine which of the important measures pending it will then take up.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont for my own information what is the difference? Is there any difference except this, that if the bill be made a special order a majority of the Senate can lay it aside; and if it be not made a special order a majority of the Senate may take it up? Is there any difference except the form of the vote, if a majority desire to displace it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no more difference than there is in any other instance of a special order; and therefore it is as I was trying to say to the Senator from Ohio, that there is no need of insisting upon its being made a special order because it will not give him any insurmountable special advantage; but at the same time, with the courtesy that prevails among Senators, where a special order had been made Senators might feel it to be a duty to let that go on when if it had not been made they would have chosen to do something else on that particular day.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It seems to me, with deference to the Senator from Vermont, that the very reason he urges removes from my motion any inconvenience, for the reason that a majority of the Senate in case any more urgent and important business is then pressing upon their attention can set aside the special order, and the question of courtesy certainly would not interfere in that contingency, because the question of courtesy would be waived by the superior question of the urgency of the business. I submit that the Senate ought to be so willing to get rid of the present consideration of the question as to have the matter assigned in that way, as I have moved. I trust there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Texas Pacific Railroad bill with a view to make a motion to postpone it. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] addressed the Senate on this subject some days ago I gave notice that I desired also to address the Senate at some future day. Subsequently the Senator from Ohio gave notice that he would call up this bill for the purpose of permitting me to address the Senate to-day, and said that after I had done so he would then move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill. I desire to address the Senate before the end of the session and would like to do so to-day if it be agreeable to the Senate; if not, at any other time that is agreeable this week or next week. I am willing to go on now, or to have it understood that I shall do so at some future day. Before the question is put on this motion, I wish an understanding on that subject. With the leave of the Senate, I will go on now. If not I will ask permission to be heard to-morrow or next day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator had better go on now. I understand the bill to be up, and now is the best time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want to interfere, but the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] has the floor on the post-route bill, and I suggest that the Senator from Louisiana will probably not detain the Senate long, and if the Senator from Virginia can make his remarks after the Senator from Louisiana has spoken, it may be more satisfactory all around.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true. I think the Senator from Louisiana has the first right, although this railroad bill is now up and has to be laid aside again.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have not any objection to yielding now, provided I get an opportunity of proceeding to-morrow.

Mr. FERRY. I understand that the Senator from Louisiana has the floor on the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the post-route bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What becomes of the railroad bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been disposed of. The Senator from Ohio moves that it be postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Texas Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that the Senator from Virginia wishes to be heard before it is postponed.

Mr. FERRY. I yielded to the Senator from Ohio merely to give a notice and ask for an order of the Senate, not to supersede the post-route bill. I cannot yield for the purpose of having any speech made on that measure. The Senator from Louisiana had the floor last evening, and he is desirous of expressing his views on the post-route bill, and it would be supplanting him. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator from Michigan is quite right in my understanding of his courtesy, which was to informally lay aside the bill of which he had charge to enable me to call up the Texas Pacific bill for the purpose merely of the disposition which has been suggested.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me suggest that after the Senator from Louisiana makes his speech the Senator from Virginia shall be heard.

Mr. FERRY. When I remind the Senator from Delaware that his colleague upon the committee, the Senator from Texas, follows the Senator from Louisiana, and is desirous of expressing himself, inasmuch as the Senator himself has expressed himself on the opposite side, I think he will not insist upon supplanting the proceeding on this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only spoke as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Virginia, which I think we ought to award him, as he had formally announced his desire to be heard.

Mr. FERRY. I think I have shown a disposition to extend courtesy; but I cannot discriminate between Senators. Having charge of the post-route bill, I am pressed for its conclusion, and I think we shall get through with it to-day. I know of no others who desire to speak at length upon the proposition, and I think after the Senator from Texas has concluded his remarks following the Senator from Louisiana we shall be prepared to take the vote.

Mr. WHYTE. I think it due to state to the Senator from Michigan that this bill cannot pass until I have had the privilege of expressing my own views on the subject.

Mr. FERRY. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Maryland. That, then, will be the third speech. After he concludes I think there will be no other speech, and we then can take the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I withdraw the suggestion I made, for the present, to allow the debate to go on upon the pending bill.

Mr. FERRY. I hope that will come up again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This was taken up, the other being merely laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The post-route bill was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order to give the Senator from Louisiana the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope some understanding will be agreed upon by the Senate as to what time I shall address the body; I only want to take about an hour, perhaps not so much. If it is agreeable to the Senate, after the Senator from Louisiana is through, I should like to be permitted to address the Senate at that time. I ask the President to submit that to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia proposes that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana he shall have the floor to proceed upon the Texas Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. FERRY. I hope that will not be done. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not press that. There will be an opportunity afforded him; but now the post-route bill is pending, and we want to get through with it. There is nothing to prevent the Senator from addressing the Senate for a short time thereafter, unless the Senate shall order otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's bill. If the Senate will allow me to-morrow, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. FERRY. It consumes so much time to-day, and we have the bill so far through—we are on the last sections of the bill and can conclude it—that I hope the Senator from Virginia will not persist.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senate will agree to hear me to-morrow after the morning hour, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. FERRY. That I should be willing to agree to, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MAXEY. I only desire to say in this connection that I was instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make a report upon the sections now under consideration as an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill. I have not yet had an opportunity of presenting to the Senate the reasons which induced the committee to make that report. It is due to myself and it is due to the committee that I should have that privilege. After the Senator from Louisiana speaks, I shall claim the floor.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to fortify what has been said by my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Texas, that he gracefully yielded to the Senator from Louisiana in order to allow him to express himself this morning, and certainly he is entitled to the floor. He has charge of this part of the bill and should have spoken at first, but he yielded to other Senators, and now his place ought not to be taken from him.

MOTIONS AS TO PRIORITY OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely rise to offer and have referred to the Committee on Rules of the Senate this resolution:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:
All motions relating to the priority of business shall be decided without debate.

We spend about an hour a day on an average, toward the end of the session in deciding what we shall take up. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Florida, to the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as sections 38 to 44, inclusive, for the establishment of steamship mail service with Brazil.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of consuming much of the time of the Senate in discussion; nor would I at this late day of the session ask the attention of the Senate if there had not been an effort made by the opponents of the pending measure to remove it from its true into a very false position.

It has been asked by Senators during this discussion, how can it be that we should propose to pay $300,000 of the people's money to carry the mails between Brazil and the United States when, as it has been shown by figures, this mail service can be performed for $1,200 a year? In other words, there has been an attempt to create a prejudice against this proposition, to excite some suspicion against it in the minds of Senators; and even the expression has been used that this is a pretense; that under the head of mail service or postal compensation there is some secret object which is not disclosed upon the face of the bill. Mr. President, the reason why this appropriation bill comes under the head of postal compensation or mail service is a very simple reason, and very easily understood if we consult the legislative history of our country with reference to this question.

This power must be lodged somewhere. Some department of the Government must be chargeable with this expenditure of the public money. And let us see what has been heretofore done.

In 1845 this same question of giving Government aid to steam mail service came up, and there was an act passed which was entitled "An act to provide for the expenses of the Navy." That was with reference to the Collins subsidy. Another act was passed with reference to the Sloo subsidy, which was entitled "An act to provide for the construction of naval steamships;" and still another act was passed by which a line was subsidized from Panama to San Francisco and the Territory of Oregon. But when they came to draw up the contracts in which it was to be stipulated what the consideration was that these parties should deliver to the United States Government for these large sums of money, what was the service that they should render to the Government of the United States, it was expressly stated in every one of those contracts, in the Collins contract, in the Sloo contract, and in the Harris contract, that it was for carrying the mails of the United States Government and nothing else. So that in 1850, Mr. President, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body, through its chairman, made a report to the Senate of the United States, in which it was stated that this question had then been placed in a false position, and the recommendation was made that all these contracts, this whole subject-matter, should be transferred to the Post-Office Department of the Government; and from that day to this every appropriation that has been made in order to subsidize a steamship line has been made under the control of the Post-Office Department.

Such is the practice of all other governments. You may call it a pretense, you may call it a pretext; but so far as precedent is concerned, and so far as the practice of this Government can establish anything, since 1850 this is the regular and legitimate mode, and not an indirect mode, of presenting such a question for the judgment of the Senate of the United States. It is the method adopted by France, by England, by Spain, by Italy, and by every other country; wherever those governments propose to subsidize a steamship line it is put under the head of mail service and postal compensation.

Of course it would be simply preposterous for any one to advocate the passage of a bill providing that we should pay $309,000 a year for a service which could be performed for $1,200. Every one who has ever heard of this bill perfectly well understands its object, its purpose, and its scope. It simply presents the broad proposition whether the United States Government shall adopt the same means which have been employed by other governments in order to compete for a trade which the advocates of this measure consider of immense benefit to the American people. If the view be taken that this trade is not valuable, if the view be taken that we are in such condition as to dispense with the commerce of the thirty or forty millions inhabiting the South American states, which European governments have so successfully striven to control, and which they have monopolized, and monopolize to our exclusion at this day, if it be considered that our industries are prosperous, that we are not overproducing, that it is not necessary for us to seek new markets, to create new demands for our products, very clearly there is no necessity for passing such a law as is now proposed; but if, on the other hand, judging by the experience of other governments which have spent vast sums of money, and which are spending large sums of money to-day, in order to acquire and to control this trade, which we claim legitimately belongs to the United States, if we establish rapid steam communication with these countries, then a great deal can be said in favor of this measure.

The objection was made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and urged with very considerable force, that this was a bill which was prepared in the interest of Mr. John Roach, and that it was intended to give a subsidy and to bestow a gratuity upon that individual. In the first place these contracts are to be let to the lowest bidder. In the next place there is a maximum rate of compensation prescribed. There is no criticism made with reference to any of the requirements in the bill. It has not been urged that the steamships, if we should maintain any, should not be of the character described in the bill; it has not been urged that the compensation is excessive; but the argument has been advanced simply that because Mr. John Roach, having invested his capital in building steamships and giving employment to American labor, having, by his sagacity and foresight, anticipated what would be the inevitable action of Congress with reference to controlling this trade with Brazil, having had the nerve to invest and to utilize his capital in preparing himself and placing himself in such a condition as to bid advantageously for these contracts, should they be offered, therefore we should not establish steam mail communication with the Empire of Brazil!

The honorable Senator from Delaware suggested that his constituents should have an opportunity to compete, that they are not placed on an equality with Mr. Roach. Why, Mr. President, are we to wait indefinitely until half a dozen firms build steamships in order that we may have the luxury of mere competition? I ask the Senator if he can cite a single case where the Government of the United States lets out a contract that some party has not an advantage over another party. You may take the case of the smallest letting, where a man owns an old wagon and a pair of spavined horses and is considered rich, has he not an advantage in bidding for a mail contract over his neighbors who are not so blessed as he? Take the case of river service; has not the party who has invested his capital in building those magnificent packets carrying the mails from New Orleans to Vicksburgh and from Vicksburgh to Memphis, Tennessee, where they travel with such extraordinary speed, an advantage in bidding for postal contracts over parties who are not as well equipped and not as well prepared? Take the case of a railroad. Why should not the argument be used that we ought not to pay the excessive compensation allowed for railroad mail service until somebody else builds railroads to and from different points? I cannot see what possible effect the mere fact of a party having placed himself in a more advantageous position than his neighbors can have upon the question whether or not the Government shall give aid in establishing a steamship line between Brazil and the United States.

Mr. Roach has an advantage in bidding in reference to the New York line, because he has an inchoate contract with the Emperor of Brazil, by which the Emperor of Brazil is to pay a subsidy to that line. But that is not the case with reference to the New Orleans line. There has been a company organized in the State of Louisiana, under a charter granted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, for the express purpose of becoming a bidder for this contract, which is to be let out by the Postmaster-General for the line between New Orleans and Rio de Janeiro. Then what has the mere fact of Mr. Roach being in a position to compete advantageously over other parties with reference to the New York line to do, what possible effect can that mere circumstance have with reference to establishing the New Orleans line?

I hope that the argument used by the Senator from Delaware was not intended to create a prejudice against this amendment. I know that his utterances are conscientious; I know that he is actuated by honest convictions; but I must tell the Senator, in all frankness, that I was very much surprised to hear that such an argument could be addressed to the Senate and the American people, provided the fact be established that it will be a public benefit and a public advantage to have rapid steam communication with the Empire of Brazil.

The Senator from Delaware stated that this was the most outrageous proposition that he had ever heard of, and that it was a proposition which should be firmly and emphatically denounced by this body. I was not aware, Mr. President, that any proposition could be characterized as "outrageous" which involved a mere question of giving Government aid to a steamship line. There are governments in this world which are administered upon principles of very strict economy. You may take the government of France, you may take the government of Germany, of Great Britain, of Belgium, of Spain, and half a dozen other European governments which I could name, every one of which has been many years in the past, and is to-day, subsidizing steamship lines.

What is the sentiment in this country with reference to this "outrageous" proposition? The President of the United States in his annual messages of 1875 and 1876 called the attention of the Congress of the United States to the anomalous condition of our relations with the Empire of Brazil and in terms recommended to Congress that Government aid should be given to steamship lines. The Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans has repeatedly memorialized Congress on this question; the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, the resolutions of which I got from the Senator from Pennsylvania this morning; the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; the most influential and leading merchants of the city of Boston; the merchants of the city of New York; the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York; the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Memphis—I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to that—the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Saint Louis, have all memorialized us on the subject. We have also had the petitions of the Philadelphia Board of Trade; of the Merchants' Exchange of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; of the Board of Trade, and citizens generally, of Omaha, Nebraska; of the Philadelphia Cotton Exchange; of the Board of Trade of New Brunswick, New Jersey; and the resolutions of the postal convention held at Old Point Comfort, where there were three hundred delegates representing thirty cities in the United States. All these influential bodies of our citizens have petitioned Congress in favor of granting a subsidy for this steam mail service.

Upon many questions which have been discussed in this body there has been a marked diversity of opinion; sometimes it has been sectional; sometimes it has been manifested by mere class interests; but upon this one measure, with reference to this "outrageous" proposition, I believe that there has been a united public sentiment in its favor, from the State of Maine to the State of Texas. The question has been discussed by all the leading newspapers in the United States, and it has escaped my notice if there be a single newspaper in the United States that gives its attention to commercial topics that has not warmly advocated the measure under discussion.

The Senator intimated that those of us who advocated this measure ought to be dismissed from the public service. I shall not notice such a suggestion.

Mr. President, the question really is whether we shall take advantage of the experience of other nations, those nations which have so far succeeded in excluding us from trade with these South American countries merely by this system of subsidizing steam mail lines. Now, sir, we have to deal with facts. It is by steam-communication that the trade of the world is controlled. If any nation proposes to extend or enlarge or expand its commercial relations with any other nation, I think that the proposition is established beyond question that that trade can only be controlled by rapid steam-communication between those countries.

But we have been told that there is a line between New York and Brazil. Mr. President, for one, I do not propose to fall into any such English trap. You have steamers there of six or seven hundred tons to carry freight, leaving at irregular times, no one knowing when they start from one port or when they will depart from the other port, but going at intervals, running at the rate of eight knots an hour, having accommodations for six or eight passengers, and not being able to get a complement even of that number of passengers, and it is not surprising. And it is gravely proposed that we can wrest from England and from France this important trade, simply because you have these small steamers running from New York to Rio. Why, Mr. President, to gain such a trade from another country is a great struggle. Do you suppose a Brazilian merchant is going to break up his connections in England, establish new credits in this country, simply because there is a line of small steamers running between New York and Rio de Janeiro, which may be withdrawn at any time? That is not the way merchants conduct their business. Go on your steamers that leave New York for Liverpool or for Havre and you will see that 75 per cent. of the male passengers are business men crossing the ocean in order to visit their commercial constituents; and the very first condition, the essential condition, if we wish to establish commercial relations with Brazil, is to have steamers so equipped and having such accommodations and having such a rate of speed and having regularity as to the day of their departure and the day of their arrival, in order that Brazilian merchants may visit your country and that Americans may visit Brazil. To some this may appear a very insignificant detail, but to any one who is conversant with the subject it is a matter of very great importance.

I would call the attention of the Senate to some statistics showing the condition of the trade between Brazil and the United States:

Thus it appears that our imports from Brazil between 1860 and 1877 increased over 100 per cent., while our exports to it increased only about 20 per cent.

I will also call the attention of the Senate to the articles of import into Brazil to show how easily we could furnish the articles which are now being furnished by England and by France. Look at what a small proportion we furnish of Brazil's imports of boots and shoes, cod and other fish, butter and cheese, agricultural implements:

From this incomplete list it will be seen that Brazil receives from us in considerable quantities but a few articles, while she has other needs, now wholly neglected by us, which we might supply.

I wish next to call the attention of Senators from the Mississippi Valley to the particular objects for which there is a demand in Brazil and which can be furnished from the Mississippi Valley through the port of New Orleans. I have in my hand a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, which I will read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
May 8, 1878.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry I would say that the following articles of export to Brazil would to a greater or less extent be sent from New Orleans, provided there were good facilities for rapid and cheap transportation:

Flour and other breadstuffs.
Lard.
Beef, pork, bacon, hams, and other provisions.
Cheese, the production of Ohio chiefly.
Butter, the production of Ohio and other northwestern States.
Agricultural implements and machinery, made in Ohio and Illinois chiefly.
Furniture, manufactured in Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and other towns.
Watches, manufactured in Illinois.
Glass and glassware from Pittsburgh, Wheeling, and other towns on Upper Ohio.
Iron and steel, and manufactures thereof, including nails, from Pittsburgh and other towns on the Upper Ohio.
Lumber, from Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida.
Railroad cars, from Ohio, Illinois, and other northwestern States.
Tar and pitch and spirits of turpentine, from North Carolina, would probably go, to some extent, via New Orleans.
Paper and paperhangings, to some extent.
Besides the above the following would, to a small extent, be exported via New Orleans: Boots and shoes, clothing, cotton and woolen goods, harness, cigars, snuff, &c.

Very respectfully yours,

EDWARD YOUNG.

Hon. J. B. EUSTIS,
United States Senate.

If we look, Mr. President, at the amounts which other governments have paid and pay to-day to support steamship lines, it is not surprising that an American steamship in foreign ports should be a matter of curiosity. A naval officer the other day stated, at a banquet given in New York by the Chamber of Commerce, that one day in the port of Rio de Janeiro he counted forty-six steamships, English, German, Italian, French, but not one which bore the American flag. In 1876 not a single vessel cleared from the port of New Orleans for the port of Rio de Janeiro, although we imported in that year over $5,000,000 from Brazil, which came mostly in British bottoms. England, in 1871, paid for steamship subsidies $6,000,070; and as fast as her steamship lines become self-sustaining of course the amount of these subsidies is gradually decreased, so that in 1876 she paid $4,420,000 to subsidized steamship lines. France, in 1877, paid to steamship lines at the rate per mile of 31 francs and 85 centimes, which makes $6.37 per mile which France paid to her subsidized lines. I have a list of the subsidies paid by other countries per mile:

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate longer in discussing this question. It seems to me that it is a question which in all its force draws itself to the judgment of every Senator. I believe that this is the most practical measure that has been submitted to Congress for its decision. I have listened with great attention to a great many learned disquisitions on questions of finance, one school maintaining that by passing a certain bill relief would be afforded to the people, and that idea has been strennously combated by the other side. Therefore I have never been able to form a very clear opinion as to whether any of the legislation which has been enacted will really afford relief to the people. There is one thing that we know beyond dispute, and that is that month after month exhibits an increased number of unemployed laborers and artisans in this country and exhibits an increased number of commercial bankruptcies. There seems to be no check with reference to the disasters which are befalling us; and the practical question which I ask myself, with due humility and with due deference to the opinions of other Senators, is, how long can this condition of affairs continue through this country; where and how is it to end and to terminate? Does our mere form of government protect us against the distress and the danger to society which may result from having a large number of unemployed laborers in this country? Is it sufficient or satisfactory or consoling to tell the American citizen that he has a right to trial by jury and freedom of speech and freedom of conscience and that we have a glorious form of government, when his answer is that he wants bread for himself and his starving family.

I have always been an advocate of establishing a steamship line between the United States and Brazil, but I am still more warmly enlisted in this measure when I contemplate the condition of the industrial classes in the United States to-day. A very celebrated French writer, who has written a very valuable work with reference to the misery of the industrial classes of England and of France, has said that we can always ascertain with precision the effects of an earthquake, the effects of a flood, and the effects of a pestilence; but that whenever a country has the disease of men who have been accustomed to honestly earn their livelihood and to earn a competency for their families, who find themselves brought face to face with the alternative of becoming criminals, it is a disease the effects of which cannot be ascertained, because it is a silent and gradual disease.

Now, Mr. President, I believe that, by discovering new markets, by ascertaining by commercial intercourse whether we cannot equalize our exports to and imports from Brazil instead of importing 50 per cent. of the exports from Brazil and only exporting to that country 10 per cent. of its imports, we can stop this decay of our maritime prosperity and power by doing what? By doing anything wrong, as the Senator from Delaware suggests? By doing anything outrageous? By doing, Mr. President, what the superior sagacity and statesmanship of the first government in this world should by this time have taught us that we should do; and it is my judgment that inevitably we will do it, whatever may be the fate of this present measure.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I was charged with the duty, by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which I am a member, of reporting to the Senate the measure under consideration, which duty I discharged and the report has been printed and laid upon the table of every Senator.

This measure received most careful consideration of that committee, and, with a unanimity singular where a measure is contested, it was reported favorably from that committee, with but two dissenting voices. There has been placed upon the table of every Senator the well-considered report of the able Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, and we learn from that report that that committee carefully considered the same measure and came to the same conclusion as did the committee of the Senate. Thus we have two committees specially intrusted, one by the Senate and the other by the House, with the consideration of this measure and its bearing upon the general well-being of our country, and those two committees, diverse in politics, have arrived at the same conclusion. Mr. President, that should weigh something. That is a point which should be considered.

Now it is entirely clear to every man who has studied the question that by the vast increase in the means of transportation, in the means of transporting the products of the plow, of the loom, and of the anvil from the interior to the seaboard, and by reason of the wonderful improvements in machinery and in agricultural implements the products of our country have been immensely increased. The annual increase is amazing, and the last year reported shows the amount of exports from this country to foreign countries to be $696,115,892. Every one knows that the industries of our country are prostrated, that labor to a large degree is paralyzed.

What course now is to be pursued? We must find a market, a profitable market, for this vast surplus; we must devise some means whereby the business of the field, and of the workshop, and of the factory may be made profitable, or we must cease surplus production. We raise this immense amount of surplus, more than we need for our home purposes, and the markets of the world, so far as we have reached those markets, are not remunerative. Hence, then, the proposition presents itself to the minds of all of us, and we cannot avoid it: we must either stop producing so much or we must find markets.

Believing that the interests of the people of this country, the interests of the laboring people of this country, the interests of the people who till the farms, who are engaged in the workshops, who are engaged in the mercantile establishments, and in the manufacturing establishments, the interests of the hard-working bone and sinew of this country, demand more and better markets, I cheerfully support this measure as aiding that result.

An examination of the frame-work of this bill will perhaps be of service to those who have not specially investigated it. The bill provides for two lines of mail steamships between the United States and Brazil, so arranged as to times of departure as to give to us semi-monthly mails. One of these lines of mail steamships is to ply between the city of New York and the city of Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, and to touch, as the bill is amended, at Norfolk, Virginia, St. Thomas, Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, in Brazil, both going and returning. That is one of the routes. The other of the routes is to leave the city of New Orleans, going to the city of Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, touching, both going and coming, at Galveston, Texas, and at such other ports in the United States, the West Indies, and Brazil as the Postmaster-General may deem necessary. So much, then, for that.

The second section of the original bill, or the thirty-ninth section of the printed post-route bill, provides that the lettings shall be by separate contracts after due advertisement according to the laws of the land; that the bills shall not exceed an amount specified on the face of that section; that the party who gets the contract or contracts shall give bond with approved security for the faithful performance of his contract. Such is the general nature of that section. No one is mentioned to whom the contract is to be given, but it distinctly affirms that any man, it matters not who, a citizen of the United States, who may have the means of purchasing these vessels, or may have the vessels, may become a contractor. So much for that point.

The next section provides that these steamships shall be constructed and furnished for mail service, going at the rate of thirteen knots an hour, and shall not be of less tonnage than three thousand tons burden; shall be American built and American owned, and constructed of iron, after the best models. The Post-Office Committee did not see proper to depart from the registration laws of this country as they now exist, and they have followed the law as it now is found in sections 4131 and 4132, on page 831 of the Revised Statutes. A portion of that committee believe, as I believe, that the registration laws are not wise, but not believing that it was our province to attempt in this manner to change the laws, followed the registration acts so far as ownership is concerned and so far as the building is concerned. So much for that.

The next section provides that the Government shall be entitled to have transported, with fare and accommodations, agents of the Government, and so on.

The next section provides in case of failure the amount to be paid. The number of trips to be made by each line is provided for. Each is to make twelve round trips, and the vessels are to leave as near as may be two weeks apart. It is also provided that these vessels shall be examined by a proper naval officer, and they must be so constructed as to be adapted to and available for naval purposes, and the United States Government has the right to become a charterer in the event the Government desires to lease these vessels for any purpose.

Such, Mr. President, is the general outline of the bill: one route from New York to Brazil; one route from New Orleans, by way of Galveston, to Brazil.

What are the benefits to result? When you come to the great manufacturing and mercantile North and East the cry comes up from every portion of that country that they are overproducing, that they cannot find a market for their surplus productions. Laborers are thrown out of employment; factories cease to work. New England manufactured goods have been sent even from the United States to Europe for sale. And when you come to the great valley of the Mississippi River, with its teeming millions of population, almost all agricultural, you find the same complaints. And when you cross the great Father of Waters and go west of the Mississippi River you find there, with its thriving, industrious, energetic population, a population not excelled anywhere, the same discontent.

What, then, are you going to do? I have stated that the people of the United States have built an amount of railroads that for the age of this country is astonishing, far greater in amount than that of any country in the world of the age of the United States. In addition to these great means of transportation by rail, we have an internal transportation by lake and by river; and every railroad which penetrates a country develops and puts into cultivation land which without the means of transportation would be valueless; and thus it happens that by that cause and the improvements in agricultural implements less muscle can now produce more products than a few years ago. By means of these railroads the surplus product can find its way to the seaboard, to the great commercial ports of the United States. When they reach there what condition do we find? Of the $696,000 000 of exports from the United States in the year 1877, $480,000,000 were shipped in foreign vessels, and but $116,000,000 in round numbers in American vessels, showing an excess of exports from our own ports in foreign bottoms of over $300,000,000. Thus while we have gone to the enormous expense of providing railways in every portion of the land and the freight and travel charges on these railroads simply pass from one pocket to another of our own people and do not at all drain the country, yet the instant you get to a sea-port and seek a foreign market three-fourths of this vast surplus which I have named is picked up by foreign bottoms, carried to foreign ports, exchanged for foreign goods brought back in foreign vessels, and landed in American ports; and thus it is that the American people have a constant drain, an annual drainage in the way of freights and travel alone of $50,000,000. There is a constant drain of that much, and that is one of the many causes of your hard times.

There were in 1876 in the United States 77,470 miles of railway, and that was distributed, (giving in round numbers the figures for convenience) five and a half thousand in New England, fifteen thousand in the Middle States, thirty-seven thousand in the Western States, sixteen and a half thousand in the Southern States, nearly three thousand in the Pacific States, making the grand total as I have stated. These are a most convenient and useful means of transportation. It is a point that should not be forgotten that when you build railroads in the country, and especially when you cross the great Mississippi and penetrate that magnificent country with your railways, you thereby develop a new country, which brings to man's subjection new soil and consequently new products. Thus year by year, and rapidly too, this vast surplus is increasing, and it becomes a problem that statesmen should look at, and look at wisely and well, what shall we do with this surplus?

In 1867, only eleven years ago, there were in the United States but 39,276 miles of railway, and that amount has been increased in the last eleven years 38,194 miles. In other words, the railways have nearly doubled in eleven years. With that doubling of railways the improvements in agricultural implements and in the implements for manufacturing machinery and the products of shops have correspondingly increased manufactured and agricultural products. To this means of transportation should be added the great transportation that we have by rivers and by lake within our country.

Another remarkable fact will show what we are doing. In 1853 there was a merchant-marine tonnage of 4,407,000 tons. In 1877, twenty-four years afterward, there were but 4,242,000 tons. Instead of progressing in this great industry, instead of that keeping pace with the other industries of this country, it has actually decreased in twenty-four years 165,010 tons.

Some other remarkable facts manifest themselves. In 1815 the tonnage of ships built in the United States was 154,624 tons. It runs up in 1855 to 583,450 tons, and in 1876 it fell back to 176,592 tons, or but 21,964 tons increase in sixty-one years. In those sixty-one years the population of this country has increased from about 8,500,000, as it was in 1815, until it is about 44,000,000, and increase in farms, the increase in cities, in railroads, in every industry in all this land, (except in ship-building, where it has been going down step by step,) has kept pace with increase of population, and ship-building is but 21,000 tons more in 1876 than it was in 1815, and is less by 406,000 tons than it was twenty-one years ago. That is a remarkable fact that we should notice. I take these data from the ably and conscientiously prepared tables as found in the almanac of our thoroughly educated Librarian, Mr. Spofford.

I have just given the amount of the exports last year carried in American bottoms and the amount that was carried in British bottoms. It is shown that the British bottoms carried three times as much of our own exports as American ships.

Mr. President, it is said, and some of our friends are extraordinarily aggrieved over that question, that this is a subsidy, as they call it, that it is taking the hard earnings of the people out of their pockets; and it would seem from the utterance of those who oppose the measure that those who think as I do on questions of that kind were a fearful set of men to send to this body.

I have associated with the people from my earliest childhood, following since manhood a profession which required me to mix with them, to be among them, and I am of them, having made myself what little of this world's good I own by my own hard labor, I think that I can appreciate the wants and wishes of the people as much as those who set themselves up here as the special guardians of the people. When I hear protestations of that kind made day after day, day in and day out, I feel, as the Queen expressed it in Hamlet—

The lady doth protest too much, methinks.

There is too much of that protestation. People understand what that means; it deceives nobody. A man who is the true friend of the people will do what he may to give life and vitality to the drooping energies and industries of this country, without eternally talking about what ought to be done.

It is said that England subsidizes her lines. Yes, sir; Great Britain, with the frost of a thousand years upon her hoary locks—stronger by age—has never for an instant lost sight of the wise statesmanship and sagacity to build up her trade everywhere. Wherever England can find a market for her wares, there goes the flag of old England over England's ships. Whether that trade be large, or whether it be small, wherever England can sell her wares, getting either the money or something in exchange for those wares which she desires, England does it; and where that trade is too weak to throw the burden of it upon private enterprise and private capital, the wisdom and sagacity of that country lends the helping hand of the government and the government helps it until the trade is able to help itself. Her policy has been steadfast. She has never varied from it. She has gone on in the same line of policy step by step, and to-day the flag of England floats in every sea, and the sun sets not upon British soil. She has made herself glorious, she has made herself great, because she had far-seeing, fearless men, men who had the sagacity and the wisdom to do their duty fearlessly, and she has won by her energy and wisdom the commerce of the world. She is our great competitor. We should profit by her example.

Now, Mr. President, what has been our policy? We never attempted to aid, to encourage, and foster commerce with foreign nations until in the year 1843, when the first act was passed by a democratic Congress; and I will be glad to call that to the attention of some of my democratic friends who are so much wiser than the rest of us and than those who have gone before us.

A member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House addressed a letter to the Postmaster-General touching prior legislation, and received the following answer:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, in answer to your letter of this date, that the following is the statement of subsidies paid to different steamship lines since the year 1847, for transporting the United States mails to and from foreign ports under the provisions of special acts of Congress, which was furnished to Hon. T. W. FERRY, chairman, &c., under date of the 15th instant:

1. A monthly service between New York and Bremerhaven, Germany, via Southampton, England, (distance 3,700 miles,) at an annual pay of $200,000, agreeably to act of March 3, 1845.

2. A semi-monthly service between Charleston, South Carolina, and Havana, Cuba, via Savannah, Georgia, and Key West, Florida (distance 669 miles,) at an annual pay of $50,000, agreeably to acts of March 3, 1847, and July 10, 1848.

3. A semi-monthly service between New York and Aspinwall, New Granada, direct, (distance 2,000 miles;) between New York and New Orleans via Havana, (distance 2,000 miles;) and between Havana and Aspinwall, (distance 1,200 miles,) at an annual pay of $290,000, agreeably to acts of March 3, 1847, and March 3, 1851.

4. A semi-monthly service between Astoria, Oregon, and Panama, New Granada, via San Francisco, California, (distance 4,200 miles,) at an annual pay of $348,320, agreeably to acts of March 3, 1847, and March 3, 1851.

5. For twenty-six round-trips a year between New York and Liverpool, England, Collins line, (distance 3,100 miles,) at an annual pay of $858,000, agreeably to acts of March 3, 1847, and July 21, 1852.

6. A monthly service between New York and Havre, France, via Cowes, England, (distance 3,270 miles,) at an annual pay of $150,000, agreeably to act of March 3, 1847.

7. A monthly service between New York and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, touching at Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, Brazil, (distance not stated,) at an annual pay of $150,000, agreeably to act of May 28, 1864.

8. A monthly service between San Francisco and Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, (distance not stated,) at an annual pay of $75,000, agreeably to act of March 2, 1867.

9. A monthly service between San Francisco and Hong-Kong, China, via Yokohama, Japan, (distance seven thousand and fifty miles,) at an annual pay of $500,000, agreeably to acts of February 17, 1865, and February 18, 1867.

At present all the United States ocean mail-steamship service is being performed under the provisions of the general law, which allows, as full compensation for the service, the amount of sea-postage on the mail conveyed.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. CHAPMAN FREEMAN,
House of Representatives.

Much the larger portion of these acts were in democratic days, when the democratic party controlled the policy and destinies of this country. The democratic party acted wisely in passing these acts, and the policy should have been steadily kept up. Then that was followed up by the republican party, who passed like acts for carrying on these lines. But the difference between the United States and Great Britain upon this point is that there was continuity of purpose in Great Britain, a fixed line of policy, a steadiness in the pursuit of that policy, never varying, never faltering, starting out for her objective point, to capture the commerce of the world and pushing for it steadily, and thus made her flag float in every sea. We went at it sporadically; sometimes we would help a little, and then we would hear this hue and cry, "That is a subsidy; it is taking something out of the hard earnings of the people, and therefore we must not do it;" and we would break down; so that we have proceeded by broken purposes, by that which in effect is worse than no policy at all.

But we hear it said that this bill is a mere pretext, that it should have come from the Committee on Commerce, and not from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, that the unquestioned purpose of those who advocate this bill is the rearing and fostering of the commerce of this country, and therefore it should have come from that committee. I accept the issue, and I state broadly and squarely that I advocate this bill because I want the commerce of this country extended. I advocate it because, in the language of Jefferson, I believe that commerce is the handmaid of agriculture. I believe that there is a necessity for finding markets and competing markets for the surplus products of our country. I do not believe that we can do that without granting aid to those who desire to open our commercial facilities with foreign countries. I do believe that we have the entire right to do that under the post-office clause of the Constitution, and I doubt whether we have the right to do it under any other clause of the Constitution.

Mr. President, there are no degrees in constitutionality. A measure is either constitutional or it is unconstitutional, one or the other. There is no middle ground between an affirmative answer that the measure is so or a negative answer that it is not so. Between those two there is a wide gulf, so that it matters not what clause of the Constitution grants the power, the power once conceded, then it is a question of expediency with Congress, and the sound discretion and judgment of Congress is called upon to say whether or not they will exercise that constitutional power.

I will leave what may be said in reference to the line leading from New York to gentlemen who are much better acquainted with the statistics of the North and the East than myself, and to what was so well said by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] in regard to the products of the great Mississippi Valley, and I pass across the waters of the Gulf to the city of Galveston and give to the Senate in a few words the reason for the line from New Orleans.

Sir, I heard some sneering remarks made by gentlemen who certainly know but little about the geography of this country in regard to that section. The State of Texas to-day is an empire in herself. She has a territory of 274,356 square miles. Her area is the area of an empire. Hers is the greatest area of fertile soil on the face of the green earth. Nowhere on the footstool of man can be found so large an amount of absolutely rich soil as is found in that State. What are her products? Go to her Gulf coast and you will find there an area capable of producing sugar equal to the best sugar lands of the State of Louisiana, an area as large as the sugar land area of that beautiful State. Go out into her great cattle region, and to-day she stands bearing the banner as the great queen of cattle in America. Go to her sheep-folds, and to-day she stands third in the production of wool, surpassed only by California and by Ohio, and by but a few thousands in Ohio, and she will soon pass that State in the race. Go into her cotton-fields, into the fields of the king of commerce, and to-day she stands equal and square in the production of cotton with the State of Mississippi, and those two States are the greatest cotton-yielding States in the American Union.

Bear in mind that the seven hundred thousand bales of cotton produced annually upon the soil of Texas are produced upon less than 1 per cent. of her area, and that that State is capable of producing six million bales of cotton, upon a mathematical demonstration by the known producing capacity per acre and the known acreage. Bear in mind that that same State, without interfering with her cattle or her sheep or cotton or sugar, can produce sixty-four million bushels of wheat. Sir, it is an empire in itself. We never attempted to produce wheat for export until three or four years ago, and the amount raised this present crop, which has recently been gathered, amounts to six million bushels of wheat. It is the finest wheat east of the Rocky Mountains, contains more muscle-producing qualities than any wheat east of the Rocky Mountains. It weighs from sixty-two to sixty-eight pounds to the bushel. It is drier, freer from moisture, requires more water to knead it into dough than any other wheat raised outside of California. It ripens from four to six weeks earlier than any wheat east of the Rocky Mountains, and is unsurpassed for shipment through southern waters and warehousing in a tropical climate. This wheat we propose to convert into flour and send that flour by steamships from the port of Galveston, in Texas, to Rio, to Pernambuco, to Pará, to St. Thomas, to Bahia, and other points in Brazil, and the flour of Texas and of the great new West will reach the market there before the wheat of the North is harvested; and that flour will compete in the market with the last year's crop of any other people, and therefore beats it. I propose, therefore, to take that flour and exchange it for coffee in Brazil, and thereby save thirty-five million dollars, the balance of trade which Brazil to-day holds against the United States annually. Bear in mind, Mr. President, that of the mere pittance of a little over seven million dollars of exports sent by the United States to Brazil nearly one-half that amount is flour.

Nearly one-half of the entire amount of the products sent to Brazil now in exchange is flour. Suppose we can send the product of the wheat-fields of Texas, the wheat-fields of Kansas, of West Missouri, and of Nebraska and of Iowa, all having a direct rail connection by air line with Galveston. If we can send that to Galveston and from there to Brazil and exchange that for coffee, we thus save annually this vast sum of $35,000,000, making a market for our surplus and bringing back that product in lieu of sending gold for it.

Sir, it is a great point. It is a point in the interest of the people. It is the farmer whose interest I represent. I am not here to howl over my love for the dear people. It is not my course in life; for whenever in the honest conviction of my heart I believe the people are wrong I say so, and I do so at home or elsewhere. But on this point at least my people stand square with me on this proposition. They are too enlightened, they understand their own interest too well to be otherwise.

But, Mr. President, I am told that this is a mere pretext. I remember when the greatest statesman America ever produced, a man bold, fearless, with nerves of iron, always daring to do the right, never quailing for an instant, when Thomas Jefferson conceived that grand idea of purchasing the Louisiana Territory and adding it to the American Union, it was charged on this floor, and on the floor of the House that it was a mere pretext as to securing the defense of your country; they said, "Your talk about wanting an outlet to the open sea is a mere pretext." But, sir, steadily, never faltering, although they heaped obloquy upon his head such as was never heaped upon any man before for the assertion of his sentiments, although in the other House eight years after that, when the State of Louisiana applied for admission into the Union, one of the most distinguished men of that body declared that the admission of Louisiana as a State into the Union would ipso facto operate a dissolution of the Union, although no measure was ever attempted to be carried through that met with more obloquy and abuse than did the great measure which Mr. Jefferson carried out, what was the result of that measure? New Orleans, the great entrepôt between the Mississippi Valley and foreign countries, became an American city. The Belize came into our possession and all that magnificent territory on the right bank of the Mississippi, reaching from the great Father of Waters to include your own State, sir, [Mr. MITCHELL in the chair,] washing the golden slope of the Pacific. All that grand territory and magnificent empire of itself was brought in under that measure which was declared a mere pretext, and for the introduction of which the grandest statesman this country has ever produced was denounced and vilified by would-be patriots as no man had ever been before, and the seat of empire has crossed the Father of Waters.

I remember when another great statesman, such a one as I regret we have not among us now, John C. Calhoun, began, with the unerring sagacity of his great genius, to lay the plan for securing the State of Texas, of which I have just been speaking, as one of the States of the American Union. In 1837 he began that work although it was not concluded until the 3d of March, 1845, perhaps the last act signed by Mr. Tyler. From one end of this Union to the other every man who advocated the annexation of Texas was tongue-lashed by those who could not see into the purpose of this great and accomplished statesman and his compatriots. But Texas was added. The Lone Star Republic of Texas glided into the galaxy of the American Union, and to-day is one of the brightest and most resplendent of those resplendent stars. As one of the far-reaching consequences of that act came the Mexican war, and that was followed by the annexation, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of the great Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, California, Nevada, all of which came in. That was declared to be a pretext, and those who were in favor of that treaty were compared with those who dismembered Poland.

Thus in every instance where a great enterprise has been attempted to be carried out in this country those who have favored it have been blackened by the obloquy of those who could not see through the measure. To-day history is merely repeating itself. I dare to do what I believe to be right, and I am willing to face the people whom I represent, because I know that this measure is in their interest. Ah, you say, gentlemen, this is a mere commercial matter, and therefore it is a pretext to call it a post-route bill. It adds nothing to the resources of your country; the postage will not pay it back. You know that to-day in your country and in mine, and all that great country west of the Mississippi River, in all the great growing Northwest and Southwest, these post-routes cost the United States Government more than they bring back by between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000. According to this theory every one of those post-offices should be locked up. They are established because civilization demands that they should be there. In like manner by the precise right which we have to send our mails over the land, over the lake, over the river, we have the right to send them over the great highway of nations, the broad open sea.

Mr. President, so far, I have spoken hurriedly without notes, and in order to give others time I will now bring my remarks to a close with this point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate: that fifty-odd years ago Mr. Monroe proclaimed the great doctrine that the American soil must be controlled by American people, not foreigners; that the countries of South America and of Mexico must be held by their own people and not by foreign people. That was the mere formulating of an idea and purpose which was crystallized in the minds of the people and which had become their fixed purpose long before Mr. Monroe uttered the sentiment. If there is one idea which all the American people to-day believe in it is that grand doctrine promulged by Mr. Monroe. To effect that what course should you pursue? In the language of Mr. Jefferson, have peace, commerce, and honest friendship with these people, cultivate these people and this great trade which we have lying at our very doors; let us do all we can by the cultivating of commercial relations with them to secure that. And I will go further. Whenever the measure comes up I will go to the full extent of favoring reciprocal commercial treaties with every country south of us on this continent. I would go for uniting ourselves as far as we could do it with Mexico by railway. I would be in favor of cultivating the closest commercial intimacy with those people because it is to our interest to do it. We import from those countries more than we export to them, and it is to our interest to cultivate friendship and commerce and to sell to them what they need in exchange for our imports rather than to pay the gold to them for what we need.

This is the condition; now what is the remedy? It is manifest that one of two courses must be pursued: first, cease producing a surplus; second, find the best markets for it; the latter is wise, the former foolish. Will this measure aid materially in securing an additional competing market for our produce, manufactured and agricultural? Here I am met with the objection that, however this may be, the establishment of a mail steamship line is a mere pretext to aid commerce, and it is said that if that be the aim then the bill should have come from the Committee on Commerce, and not from Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

I accept the issue, and say that it is to energize our languishing commerce, to promote peace, commerce, and honest friendship, to vitalize home industries, to give to the producer whether of manufactured articles or of farm products another competing market, that induces me earnestly to advocate this measure. Sir, there can be no question as to the constitutional power of Congress to establish post-roads and send the mails over them, whether those roads be on land or sea, lake or river. The Constitution provides for consular and diplomatic service, (article 2, section 2.) The Constitution provides for regulating commerce with foreign states, (article 1, section 8.) Intercourse with foreign nations being thus provided for, means of communication is a necessary implied power, and the power being in Congress to provide the means, the discretion is in it to select the means in its judgment best adapted to the end. The high seas are the highways of nations, and Congress has precisely the same power to use these highways for postal purposes as it has to use any highway on the land, lakes, and rivers of our country; and so Congress has held under both democratic and republican administrations. (See acts of March 3, 1845; March 3, 1847; March 3, 1851; July 21, 1852; May 28, 1864; February 17 and February 18, 1867; March 2, 1867.) The power being thus in Congress it is more critical than substantial to say that the bill should come from one committee rather than another. Besides, if the power can be drawn from the commerce clause, (which I doubt,) and can also be lodged in the post-route clause, which I do not doubt, then the jurisdiction, so to speak, of the two committees would be concurrent and either acquiring jurisdiction could proceed; but, as I said before, that is a small matter. The bill is before the Senate, and it is a matter of no substantial importance whether it comes from one committee or the other, or no committee at all, if the Senate has the constitutional power to pass the bill.

But I take it, from the use of the word "pretext," which I have heard applied to the action of the Post-Office Committee, that there may be gentlemen whose views of the Constitution and its practical working differ very widely from mine.

That "pretext" doctrine, run out to its ultimate, proceeds I think upon the thesis that every grant of power in the Constitution must be applied to the accomplishment of a specific object and no other; that when in the practical application of a grant it is found that the resulting benefits are far greater collaterally and incidentally those flowing from the main object contemplated by the Constitution, then we must reject the entire scheme because the exercise of the power would be a "pretext." So under this view it inevitably follows that the Constitution provides for as many little machines, each complete in itself, as there are grants of power in the Constitution, the motive power of each and its quantity being the exact power, with its exact quantity set apart to it in the Constitution. So you start the grand motor, the Constitution, in action, and lead from it by different conduits—some large, some medium, and some quite small—just as much steam as the motor allows to each particular machine. Each is an independent machine rattling away on its own account. Thus a toy-shop government is established; a "curiosity-shop" among the nations of the earth. To my mind the power of the Constitution cannot be frittered away in such utopian schemes.

Emerson, in speaking of that grandest of all temples constructed by the hands of men, and dedicated to the living God, Rome's glory, St. Peter's, and of its immortal architect, who gave his life to the great work, expresses in beautiful language the thought that Michael Angelo was but a passive instrument in the hands of Omniscience, and that Angelo built as he was directed by the Grand Architect of the universe:

> The hand that rounded Peter's dome,
> And groined the aisles of Christian Rome,
> Wrought in a sad sincerity;
> Himself from God he could not free;
> He builded better than he knew;—
> The conscious stone to beauty grew.

And so I have thought of the builders of our matchless Constitution, creating a Federal Union of coequal States, distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea; a Government the most perfect in conception that ever leaped from the brain of man, beautiful in all its parts, matchless in wisdom, strength, and beauty; one great, harmonious whole, with all its parts in accord, all needful to the complete autonomy, all obeying the great mainspring, the Constitution.

No, sir, the Constitution is not for Utopia, but for living, active, busy men, and is adapted to their wants, securing to them liberty regulated by law, and by and through it the great purposes of its establishment, faithfully carried out, are secured—union, justice, domestic tranquillity, common defense, general welfare, liberty.

In the discharge of our duty two essential questions present themselves: Is the measure constitutional? Is it expedient?

If the first is answered affirmatively, as it must be, before we can consider the second, then in the consideration of the second, every benefit, direct, collateral, incidental, is legitimately to be taken into the account, and the more the resulting benefits, the more expedient the measure and the greater the reason for its passage. So if the facility of transmitting intelligence gives constitutional warrant, and it so turns out that the advantage of that is utterly overwhelmed by the blessings to commerce, manufactures, agriculture, and through them to every industry, it is not only constitutional, but eminently then indeed expedient, and we should rejoice in the possession of a Constitution of such consummate wisdom; and I believe the hand of Divinity is in the Constitution, and that the builders builded better than they knew, and conscious parchment to wisdom grew.

No, sir, this is not a Government of toys, not a curiosity shop, but I believe "that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, for the people, by the people, shall not perish from the earth," but sorely tried, "in worst extremes, and in the perilous edge of battle," it is to-day, with all its States restored to their constitutional rights, stronger in the affections of the people than ever before.

Let us but do our duty, and remember that whatever we constitutionally may, we surely ought to do, to advance the interests of the people who have confided to us our great trust.

I have no faith in howling dervishes, tiny egoists, now cursing our land, as we learn by every mail, who go about among the people stirring up discontent, preaching from the political text-book of lamentations, arraying one portion of the community against the other, preaching that both the great political parties into which the people are divided are corrupt, teaching wild and visionary schemes for securing wealth without labor in disregard of the divine injunction, misleading the people to their injury, finding fault with all the people's servants without pointing to any practical relief. I have no tolerance for that other class, less harmful because less vigorous, who through press and pamphlet and on the stump bay the moon and howl away in diatribes at mankind in general, who fancy themselves as disconsolate as the exiled Marius, "a fugitive sitting on the ruins of Carthage," a class as mischievous though less dangerous because less capable than that turbulent demagogue. The people are discontented and with cause, and it does no more good to be howling that into their ears continually without pointing out practical relief than to stand at the windlass and tell a poor fellow at the bottom of the well that he is in a bad fix and yet not take a turn at the windlass after getting your man into the bucket.

Gush plays an inconspicuous part in the practical affairs of every-day life. A good, old-fashioned political sermon with the text, faith in our Government, hope in its future, and charity toward all, followed by homely measures calculated to arouse the despondent people and to show them that there is life in the old land yet, would be sound wisdom, sound statesmanship; and I have no hesitation in saying that I would vote for any measure of real utility and practical advantage warranted by the Constitution that would give employment to willing but unemployed labor. While some of the causes of business stagnation are beyond the control or remedy of Congress, for this stagnation extends to many parts of Europe, still so far as we may constitutionally enact expedient measures of relief we ought. I know that by some all who entertain such views are pronounced wasteful and extravagant of the money of a hard-pressed people. Having some experience as well as observation of hard times, knowing precisely how it is to be without an available dollar, for I was just in that condition at the close of the war; knowing the people and their struggles, because I am with them and of them and do not need to be told, I must be permitted to judge for myself what is their interest.

I believe the measure before the Senate is in the interest of the people, the people who manufacture and the people who work on farms, and through these great industries it will benefit all the people. The people have been told often enough of their distressed condition; they are tired of it; they want bread, not stones. They want practical measures of relief, not theoretical statesmanship; and they will gladly see an appropriation made which will open workshops, relight the forges, start the plow, the loom, and the anvil, with assured hope that labor will be justly rewarded.

Mr. KERNAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from New York allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. It is evident that the Senator from Virginia [Mr JOHNSTON] will not have the opportunity of submitting his remarks to the Senate, as he desired, to-day; and I make the suggestion that after the morning hour to-morrow he be allowed to submit the remarks that he intended. I think we shall get through with the present bill to-day, and as he has asked the privilege it will be but courtesy to him to allow it.

Mr. SARGENT. It may be that after the morning business to-morrow, during the morning hour, he might be able to submit his remarks.

Mr. FERRY. Yes, after the morning business, before the conclusion of the morning hour, possibly.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Appropriations desire to bring forward the Army appropriation bill to-morrow, which they will report to-day.

Mr. FERRY. I did not design to interfere with the appropriation bill. Aside from the consideration of the appropriation bill, let the Senator from Virginia submit his remarks to-morrow. I think there will be no objection to that arrangement.

Mr. HAMLIN. It would be perfectly in order for the Senator to make his speech now.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] has the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. I shall be quite brief.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator from New York will give the Senator from Virginia to-day it will be in order for him to speak now.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It will not take any longer to-morrow.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Virginia prefers to wait till to-morrow.

Mr. WITHERS. My colleague prefers speaking in the morning, and I hope such arrangement will be made as will be most agreeable to him.

Mr. FERRY. That will be the arrangement. ["Agreed."]

EXTENSION OF MORNING HOUR.

Mr. SARGENT. With the leave of the Senator from New York, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That until the end of the present session the morning hour shall be extended each day one-half hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the purpose?

Mr. SARGENT. It allows an hour and a half each morning for morning business and the business usually considered in the morning hour.

Mr. FERRY. Had not the Senator from California better add "unless otherwise ordered?"

Mr. SARGENT. I will add "unless otherwise ordered by the Senate."

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that in place of the words "until the end of the present session" the Senator say "until otherwise ordered."

Mr. SARGENT. "Unless otherwise ordered" expresses it at the end, and I would not like to modify the form as it now stands.

Mr. CONKLING. The distinction is this: the Senator proposes to do this for the residue of the session; I do not want to agree to that at this moment. If the Senator will say "until otherwise ordered" the morning hour shall be extended as he states, I shall not object to that.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the resolution would have to be offered every time the Senate wished to extend the morning hour.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; unless it is rescinded it goes on; but the Senator proposes to order that it be extended for the residue of the session. I think that is objectionable. We may not want it extended all the way through.

Mr. SARGENT. It already provides "unless otherwise ordered." A majority vote would prevent the extension at any time.

Mr. CONKLING. Why object to my suggestion?

Mr. SARGENT. It repeats the phrase "until otherwise ordered," and is unnecessary.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the resolution be read. The Senator from California evidently does not understand my suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be again reported.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I propose, in place of the reported words, to strike out "until the end of the present session" and insert "until otherwise ordered," so that the original resolution, as modified, will read:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the morning hour shall be extended each day one-half hour.

My friend will see now what my suggestion was.

Mr. SARGENT. I see it will simply make it necessary to offer the resolution again. I will take it in that form, but I shall be prepared, if the Senate otherwise order, to offer the resolution again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California accept the modification?

Mr. SARGENT. I will, to avoid debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 20th ultimo, information in relation to the assessment of taxes against and the collection of taxes from the several street railroads in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of William A. Mann, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Henry Plowman, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1283) for the relief of James A. Barr, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1660) for the relief of Saint Michael's church, Charleston, South Carolina, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I desire that the amendments be printed at once, as the bill will be called up at the most convenient season.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BAYARD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1359) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1360) for the relief of William M. Maynadier; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1361) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That Mrs. Farley be permitted to withdraw the papers in her claim for pension from the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. WITHERS. There was an adverse report simply because the matter had not been submitted to the Pension Bureau. It was reported adversely on that ground. She wants the papers so that she can submit them to the bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the order is made.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. HEREFORD, it was Ordered, That the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 762) granting a pension to John S. Hall, of West Virginia, was indefinitely postponed, be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the post-route bill, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate as it passed the House and came here is entitled "A bill to establish post-routes in the several States herein named." The title has been amended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads so as to read "A bill to establish post-routes, and for other purposes." The other purposes are, as I understand, the sections from 38 to the end of the bill, except the repealing clause, now under consideration. By these sections, if they become a law, the Postmaster-General is directed to establish mail communication semi-monthly between the United States and Brazil. He is to do it by paying the sums named to two lines of steamers, the one a line between the city of New York and Rio, making certain stops, and the other between New Orleans and the same place, touching at other points. Thus we are to have each line making a round trip per month as required by the bill, and there is to be paid to each line $150,000 a year, in all $300,000 a year. The Postmaster-General is to contract for the carrying of the mails in this way from these points to and fro for ten years. Thus, if this bill is passed, under color of carrying the mails we appropriate $3,000,000 which is to be ultimately paid. Each line is to have $12,500 each month for each trip for carrying our mails to and from these points.

The bill provides that the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals to do this service. He shall not accept bids in excess of $150,000 per annum to each line. The fortieth section provides that the vessels shall be of not less than three thousand tons burden, American built and owned, constructed of iron after the best models. I suppose from the information I get that it is understood that if this bill shall become a law the Postmaster-General will not be able to contract for less than $150,000 a year to each line. I think we must assume that if the bill is passed a contract is to be made of that character for ten years, because there are traditions and circumstances from which it may be believed there will be no bid less than the maximum which is here named. Therefore the proposition is to have two lines of mail steamers, each line making a round trip every month to Brazil at an expense of $150,000 a year to each. In a word, we are to pay for each carriage of the mail there and return $12,500 to each of these lines. I think no one will or does claim that there is any necessity for carrying the mails to and from these points which requires any such large expenditure of money. We have cable communication with Brazil. A memorial laid upon our tables from merchants in Baltimore states that much of the business is now done by cable. I doubt not that all the business communications could be sent by telegraph to and from Brazil for less than $300,000 a year. Therefore, sir, I do not understand that any Senator urges the passage of this bill upon the idea that this large expenditure for ten years is required for the mail service between the United States and the ports in South America named. Indeed we are told by the merchants of Baltimore that the mails are being carried to and from Brazil now quite satisfactorily for $100 a month by a line of steamers.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the character of that line?

Mr. KERNAN. It is a line engaged in carrying passengers and freight, owned as I understand by a British firm which is carrying on this business, and it is managed by a merchant in New York as their agent. That is what I understand it to be. I suppose no one will insist that the products of this country must be carried to a foreign market in American ships at a higher rate of freight than they can be carried otherwise. I am as zealous for the restoration of the carrying of American commerce in American ships as any man can be, but I have a strong conviction that this will never be accomplished by subsidizing from the Treasury one or two or three lines of steamers; and therefore this argument does not have as much weight with me as with some. I think we must employ other means for the restoration of ship-building and for the restoration of commerce than subsidizing lines of steamers to run to foreign countries. We need to give our ship-builders free raw material. They tell us if we shall do that they will build ships as cheap and as good as they are built on the Clyde or anywhere else. To have commerce with South America we need to open our ports to the free importation from that country of its products. Then they will build up a trade with us, taking our manufactures and products which they need. In my judgment it is not the building of ships that creates commerce, but commerce will create ships.

I therefore wish to make a few suggestions in reference to this proposed measure as a means of building up an export trade to South America, in reference to its being a means of giving us a better market and a larger market for our products than we now have. The Postmaster-General, in his letter read yesterday by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] says that he cannot recommend the expenditure proposed for the mail service of the country. Then the question is in reference to this as a means of creating a market for our manufactured and other products in South America. Gentlemen talk about the experience of England and other countries in building up commerce with South America by means of subsidies. I shall say little about this, because I am not familiar with the circumstances. I doubt if subsidies have much to do with it. England admits the products of South America free of duty, and they sell cheap to South America what they want, and this policy has built up mutual trade and commerce. I do not believe it has been done by subsidies.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him with one question?

Mr. KERNAN. In one moment. I want to be short, and other gentlemen want to speak, I know. I wish to call attention to our own experience in this line of policy. We maintained a line of steamers for ten years from the port of New York to Rio, stopping at intermediate places, at the cost to our Government of $150,000 a year under a law quite similar to this bill. I desire to show what our export trade was before, what it was during the time that line ran on this large subsidy, and what it has been since.

For six years, from 1860 to 1865, inclusive, our imports from Brazil averaged, in a round sum, per annum, $14,528,000. We imported, observe, fourteen million and a half, in round numbers, for six years prior to 1865. Our domestic exports to that country during the same period averaged per annum $5,713,000. During this time there was no subsidized line of vessels; the trade was carried on in our sailing-vessels. In 1864 Congress passed a law, found in the statutes, volume 13, page 93, very much like the bill under consideration. It enacted in substance—

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to unite with the general post-office department of the Empire of Brazil, or such officer of the government of Brazil as shall be authorized to act for that government, in establishing direct mail communication between the two countries by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than two thousand tons burden each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips or voyages per annum between a port of the United States north of the Potomac River and Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, in the West Indies, at Bahia, Pernambuco, and such other intermediate port or ports as shall be considered necessary and expedient: Provided, That the expense of the service shall be divided between the two governments; and that the United States portion thereof shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 for the performance of twelve round trips per annum, to be paid out of any money appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department.

The contract was for ten years. The Post-Office Department contracted under that law with a line of steamers to make twelve round trips per annum from the port of New York, in accordance with the law which terminated on the 30th of September, 1875, at $150,000 per year. We had a line of steamers during ten years prior to October 1, 1875, running regularly, carrying the mails and doing such other business as it could, and what was the effect upon our import and export trade? During the ten years we imported from Brazil merchandise of the average annual value of $29,500,000 in round terms. The import trade doubled. The imports were $14,500,000 per annum during the five years previous, and our exports to Brazil were $5,700,000 per annum during the same period. The imports increased largely during these ten years, but our exports to Brazil did not. The annual average value of our exports to Brazil during the ten years was $6,364,000. Their average increase was only a little over half a million of dollars a year over what it was before the steamship line existed.

During the ten years from 1865 to 1875 that we had this line of steamers, carrying the mails regularly, a carrying freight to and from Brazil, our exports to that country were only of the average annual value of $6,364,000 as against $5,713,000 before we established the line. While we had this subsidized line we did not have low freights, which are so important to commerce and our export trade. This subsidized line destroyed competition, and freights were higher than I think they would have been if there had been no subsidized line. The freight is a tax on the producer. What it costs to get his products to market diminishes his profits.

Again, what is the lesson which this experiment of the Government gives us? It did not build up a permanent line of steamers running from ports of this country to South America. The moment the last subsidy was paid those steamers ceased to run. That is the information I get from merchants. We paid our money in trying the experiment, $150,000 a year for ten years; having but one line, our export trade did not increase except as I have stated, and as to imports we do not need to facilitate importing by subsidies, for that does not make us rich. The steamers stopped when the subsidies ceased, and we received so far as I can see no benefit from this large expenditure of the public money whatever.

That line stopped in September, 1875. What has been our experience since we have ceased to pay the subsidy? Has our export trade diminished? The average annual value was $6,300,000 while the line ran. I find from statistics that since that line stopped and during the past two years our export of domestic products to Brazil have been of the average annual value of $7,463,596, having increased about a million a year under the natural laws of trade more than with the subsidy. I regret very much that American-built steamers have not become the carriers of this commerce, but I believe it is because our policy in reference to ships is wrong. We should amend our tariff so that ship-builders who are building vessels to transport the products of our people to other countries may furnish cheap vessels. We should not tax the materials which are used to build a ship. Our skillful shipwrights can make as good ships as they make in the world if you give them a chance, but they cannot build ships as cheaply as they are built elsewhere, because of the high duty on raw material and on other things which they use. Our laws are such that we cannot buy foreign-built ships, and have a line of steamers in that way run by American citizens under the American flag, carrying our mails and transporting our commerce. We need cheap ships, but we are not allowed to purchase them cheaply whenever we can get them.

But what has grown up under the present system? We are talking about what will build up the commerce of the country. Our people need and the prosperity of the country requires that we should have foreign markets for our products, and permit our own people to earn the freight for transporting them. We did not accomplish this by the former subsidized line. I believe those steamers went out of use as soon as the subsidy ceased. What has grown up since that line ceased? A line of steamers was established between New York and Brazil in March, 1877, known as the Merchants' line. I wish it were owned by American citizens. I think we should have laws by which American citizens, and I would confine it to them, might buy wherever they could cheap vessels in order to do our own carrying trade with foreign countries. Our enterprise and energy are crippled by unwise laws, in my judgment. Private enterprise has built up a line of steamers between New York and Brazil, the Merchants' line. The owners contracted for their steamers, as I am informed, in 1876, and getting one done, they commenced running it on its first trip in March, 1877. They continued it until last January, when they had three steamers of about a thousand tons burden each, and larger steamers will be put on the line whenever the trade demands them, as no one doubts, whether they are owned by Americans or foreigners. They commenced last January with three and they have been running a trip each way every month, and carrying our mails for about $100 a month. There is no serious trouble about the mails.

The merchants of Baltimore say in their memorial, which lies on our table, that the telegraph is used very much and would be if you had the mails carried by the line of steamers proposed by this bill. The mails are carried now without complaint to and from these points at a hundred dollars a month. This bill provides that we shall require the steamers to run on schedule time and make the round trip, so that there will be one each way every month. I believe the existing line does the same now. But while they are carrying our mails for $100 or $106 or $108 a month, according to weight, we are discussing a bill that is to give a line for carrying the mails $12,500 per month, and that for ten years. I ask the attention of Senators to this. We must decide the question. I earnestly wish to decide wisely, for the welfare of the people and the prosperity of our country. After all, we come back to the question whether it is wise policy for the Government to attempt out of the public Treasury to create lines of steamships to carry freight. I think it is not. I believe with proper laws as to ship-building and as to the purchase of foreign-built ships we can build up our commerce and have our products carried to other countries cheaply. That is what the farmers want. They would rebel at the idea that you should compel them to pay more freight directly to American lines than to any other responsible line of carriers on the ocean. They will send their products to market by the cheapest line. This Merchant's line has grown up. It is doing a reasonably remunerative business.

Some gentlemen seem to think that line was put on for some other purpose than to earn dividends on capital. Let us fix our laws so that our own ship-builders and our own citizens may establish lines, as Charles Morgan did, who died the other day, leaving millions fairly earned by the carrying trade on the ocean. He established a line of steam-vessels, and I believe he never had a subsidy in the world. This Merchants' line has been built up by private enterprise without any subsidy. Our export trade is increasing by means of it, and I believe that our exports to Brazil will increase largely if we regulate our tariff so that we receive products of Brazil free, as they receive them in Europe, not barring them out by a prohibitory duty, but say, "We will take those products from you which we need without imposing duty upon them, and pay you by sending you our manufactured articles and other products of our country which you want."

This Merchants' line competes with the sailing vessels and they have to carry freights at a low rate; but the steamer of this line which left recently for Brazil carried between five and six thousand barrels of flour and a good cargo of other products of the United States. The value of the entire cargoes I will not stop to read; but it is increasing all the time, and our export trade to South America is increasing. If we give another line $150,000 a year to run down there, this line can compete with and destroy the carrying trade which is done by the twenty firms in the city where the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] lives. There are thirty-two sailing-vessels running from that port to Rio and they are doing a good business. The Government should not subsidize a line of steamers to crush out this private enterprise. Private enterprise builds up the commerce and the navigation and the prosperity of the country surely and permanently.

Mr. WHYTE. What is paid this Merchants' line for carrying the mails?

Mr. KERNAN. For January last we paid $94.96; for February, $108.94; for March, $106.24. While they do not run on schedule time, if the Postmaster-General chooses to make a contract, giving something more of compensation, we may be sure that they will be quite willing to carry our mails on schedule time.

From what we know about the Collins line and other lines to which we have given aid, our experience is that we never build up permanent trade and commerce by subsidizing lines of vessels.

Our experience is in regard to subsidized lines that the moment the subsidy ceases our whole carrying trade, so far as they are concerned, is ended. Then we have to rely on private enterprise again for our carrying trade with South America. Private enterprise is doing it now; sailing-vessels are doing it. This Merchants' line of steamers is doing it.

We will not increase our export trade with South America, in my judgment, in any considerable amount permanently by this large expenditure of the public money. If I thought it would, if I could be satisfied that it was going to build up the prosperity which comes from a large and advantageous export trade, I would be willing to act with those who favor it; but we have tried one experiment that has failed. Our export trade to Brazil and South America is larger now than it was when the subsidized line was maintained. It has grown up since it ceased. We do not encourage American ship-building by subsidizing a line or two under the pretext of carrying the mails.

What the ship-builders need, as I believe, is to give them reasonable tariff laws; permit them to have cheap materials for ships and then we will have as good ships and ships as cheap as can be built anywhere else; and then we will build up a merchant marine by private enterprise. We cannot buy foreign-built ships and sail them as American vessels now. I am informed by a very accurate gentleman that there are fourteen hundred steamers now lying idle in Europe.

If our citizens were allowed, they would buy some of them and they would carry the mails to South America for a moderate compensation under the American flag. I do not believe that the fact that we pay American-built steamers for this special service for ten years this large sum of $3,000,000 will aid at all the ship-building interest of this country. My judgment is that what we want (and the sooner our people turn their attention to bringing it about the better) is the opening of our ports to the importation of raw materials free. We are an ingenious manufacturing people.

Give us the raw materials as cheaply as they are imported into England and other countries, and I venture to say we will build up a trade in almost every market; but we cannot compete successfully if we have to pay duty, a tax, on everything that we require from abroad.

These are the suggestions I wished to make. I do it because I have been most solicitous to give a vote on this bill which would be in accordance with the best interests of the country. I cannot favor it when the experiment we have so recently tried is to the contrary. I believe we must turn our attention to a different kind of legislation than providing for the payment of large subsidies to a few parties for carrying the mails in American-built ships. This will not build up commerce; it will not give us foreign markets for our products; it will not create an American merchant marine.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Maryland will give me just one moment before he begins I will be obliged to him. I shall not be two minutes surely.

The Senator from New York says that what we need in this country is that the ship-builders shall be allowed to have their material imported without being taxed and harassed by duties. I should like to call the attention of the honorable Senator to the statutes of the United States. I simply want to read section 2513 of the Revised Statutes:

> All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and furnished after the 6th day of June, 1872, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and, upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be paid thereon.

There is not a solitary dollar, not a penny, to-day levied upon any material that is needed to go into the construction of any ship, wooden or iron. If the iron-ship builder prefers English iron to American iron, he has a perfect right to-day to use it without paying one penny tribute to the Treasury; so that the honorable Senator must confess himself mistaken on that point.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say that that does not apply at all to vessels in the coastwise trade.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah! But we are not discussing the coastwise trade to-day. That does not affect or have anything to do with this proposition. There is no dispute about the coastwise trade.

Mr. KERNAN. My judgment is that we should permit vessels to be built here without restriction, so that ship-building may grow up and in order that our people may compete with other nations. If it is true that we cannot in this country produce vessels to do the carrying trade as cheaply as other nations will, we make our farmers and manufacturers pay tribute for the carriage of our goods.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator assumes that. I do not admit it at all. The proposition is not whether you can build ships here as cheaply as you can in Great Britain. The proposition is that you cannot build a ship and run it in the Brazil trade without Government aid, as cheap as an English ship will do it with its government aid; that is all.

Mr. KERNAN. Then why do you not allow American citizens to buy English ships as they would buy a wagon and bring it home?

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; but suppose you go and buy an English ship on the Clyde, which is alongside an English line. You come here and establish a line. The English government to its line pays a subsidy; we refuse it to our line. Does the Senator from New York say that we are putting the American ship-master and the American ship-owner on the same basis as the English line? The English to-day pay confessedly large subsidies and large rewards. I grant, for the sake of the argument, that you may buy your ship abroad.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him if the British government pays any subsidy to this line?

Mr. BLAINE. They pay four million and a half dollars to-day on all their lines.

Mr. BAILEY. I speak of the line of steamers plying between the British ports and the ports of Brazil.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir, unhesitatingly I answer that they do. I cannot give exactly the amount, but I can give it to the Senator by to-morrow. Surely they pay a large amount to that line.

Mr. BAILEY. I see in the report made by the Postmaster-General of the lines of steamers subsidized by the different nations that no mention is made of any subsidy paid by the British government to the line to Brazil.

Mr. BLAINE. It may not be a private subsidy, but, for example, they give aid to them in this form—it is not uncommon in several lines: they pay two shillings and sixpence per ounce on mail matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I find all those steamers named in this report from the Postmaster-General, but I find in reference to the line running to Brazil that there is no mention made whatever of any extra compensation or any extra pay for postage.

Mr. BLAINE. That leads into too large a point for me to trench on the time of the honorable Senator from Maryland, to whom I am very much obliged.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me one moment?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Maine has read a part, and not all, of section 2513. This section provides that—

> All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and furnished after the 6th day of June, 1872, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and, upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be paid thereon. But vessels receiving the benefit of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year, except upon the payment to the United States of the duties on which a rebate is herein allowed.

The Senator will perceive that there is much that is delusive in that section so far as relates to the removal of duties upon articles that enter into the construction of a ship, because, in the first place, there are certain main articles imported, I admit, and perhaps the chief articles in the construction of a ship; but there are many more which are needed, which will occur to the experienced mind of the Senator, not embraced in this section at all.

Mr. BLAINE. What?

Mr. BAYARD. Many more?

Mr. BLAINE. One, for example.

Mr. BAYARD. Steel wire or iron wire for rigging.

Mr. BLAINE. That is very seldom employed.

Mr. BAYARD. Seldom! It forms to-day, as the Senator knows, almost the chief part of the rigging of every ship.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not happen to know it.

Mr. BAYARD. Take another fact, the construction of ships of iron to which my attention has been drawn more closely. To prevent the oxydization of that material there is a constant application of paint, which is formed with lead, and upon red lead, which is the chief kind to protect the iron work from the action of the elements, the duty is enormous.

Mr. BLAINE. It is cheaper here to-day than if brought into this country free of duty.

Mr. BAYARD. The American lead would be used by no economical man as compared with the other, in the protection of ship-work.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I may suggest to the honorable Senator that it would be quite easy to use it in a foreign port because vessels are always painted in port. That certainly would not amount to a flea-bite in the argument.

Mr. BAYARD. If practical to keep her on the stocks she could use it, but only when there.

Mr. BLAINE. That would be half the time.

Mr. BAYARD. It could not be imported for her original construction. But I pass that by for the moment. The Senator knows that to import articles requires that they must be imported in the quantities that are needed for the identical contract in question; that a merchant importing these various articles, a general importer, would not be a contractor, but he would import them for sale again to such contractors as should call for them; and it would be impossible for a general importing merchant of these materials to import them except upon special orders, which scarcely if ever would occur, because he could not state that they were imported for that purpose and put in bond by him. Therefore as a matter of practical fact this section of the Revised Statutes has been but little used in the importation of goods in bond for the construction of ships in this country. I do not say that it has not at all been used, but I mean that it has been but little used.

Another fact to prevent it is that with our fifteen thousand miles of coast, and with the enormous jurisdiction of coastwise traffic as compared to the foreign traffic in this country, it would be so serious a disqualification to an American merchant to buy a ship that at will he could not transfer a voyage from New York to Liverpool to another voyage from New York to New Orleans or anywhere along our coast, that he had better have his vessel made in America with the duties paid upon the cost of the material than to avail himself of this proposition under the contingent compulsion of being compelled to repay this duty in case he should use his vessel in the coastwise traffic for two months in the year.

I am speaking of the matter practically. My desire has been most practically and earnestly to see the American flag in the commercial marine restored to the ascendency which it had prior to 1860 in our sailing vessels. Therefore I propose to treat every proposition that is made to restore that, with the utmost favor; but at the same time, by the light of sense and experience, I do say that that section of the statute to which the honorable Senator has referred will be found to be impracticable, unfruitful for the greater part of what it seems to propose.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. The honorable Senator from Delaware refers to the language which I did not read, which really did not bear upon the point that I was illustrating. I will read it over again:

> But vessels receiving the benefit of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year except upon the payment to the United States of the duties on which a rebate is herein allowed.

Taking the section together, the Senator will observe that it put the coastwise trade of the United States between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts upon precisely the same basis that it put the foreign trade; they were allowed to do just the same.

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather take it that the exclusion of two months would apply to all.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. Let me read the whole section:

> All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal, which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Which would be the coastwise trade.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, they class that with the foreign trade because the voyages are just as remote, just as long; they require vessels of just as large size. Then when this subject was under consideration, it was said on that very point, and in respect to suggestions now, as one of its important features to which careful regard was had, that you may take a vessel engaged in the foreign trade; she comes home from Liverpool to New York; she cannot get her freight there, but if she can get in some way down to New Orleans she can get a good cotton freight; very well; then we will allow her to be two months every year in the coastwise trade. That will allow plenty of time for the transfer. So the very point the honorable Senator refers to was carefully guarded in that provision for two months, and two months were allowed every vessel engaged in the foreign trade with the United States to make the ordinary trips from port to port for the advantage of better freight, North or South, as the case might be. Now, of course, so long as the coastwise trade of the United States is given the monopoly, it would be idle to add to that any particular privilege about importations free of duty, for they were all upon the same basis. Every one is put exactly upon the same basis; every one is put upon the basis of exactly all other foreign trade in the United States from taking any part in it but for the American vessels engaged in the foreign trade of the United States they have to-day absolutely as free a right to import without duty as they could have under any law.

But let me tell the honorable Senator for the benefit of another question which looms up there, that they very soon found, for instance, on this much-mooted question of iron, that taking the superior quality of the American iron it did not pay to import the British iron; and it did not pay at the time that statute was enacted six years ago, still less does it to-day; and the ship-yards right within sight of the Senator's home that are lining the Delaware to-day, if you lay British iron down side by side with the American, will prefer the American and pay a higher price for it, though they can contract to get it at the same price.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BLAINE. The section was adapted to the state of things then existing, but all the subsequent happenings in the manufacture have been still more favorable; so that the honorable Senator from New York, whom I rose to reply to, was altogether in error, if he will pardon me, when he talked about the American ship-builder being bound down and deprived of certain advantages by reason of the tariff. He is as free as though the word "tariff" or "custom-house" had never been heard of.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the honorable Senator from Maine whether he knows any one case in which a ship has been built of materials imported in bond under the advantage offered to the ship-builder by that act?

Mr. BLAINE. I know several in my own State who tried it, and they found it to be utterly useless. They found that the idea of this boasted superiority and boasted cheapness of the foreign article was a delusion, and that they could do better with the American manufacture; and more than that, you can to-day, in the Senator's own town and on the river on which he lives, engage to have iron ships built just as good and just as cheap as you can have them built on the Clyde.

Mr. BAYARD. Not quite as cheap.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, I think quite as cheap. The difference, at all events, would not be as much as the rate of exchange on the bills which would pay for the vessel on the Clyde.

Mr. BAYARD. I am informed that for 5 or 10 per cent. they will build in competition with the Clyde.

Mr. BLAINE. For that absolute price, without any regard to the exchange of the money necessary to pay. That is the absolute price; but if it is only 5 per cent. that makes the American ship really cheaper.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I am surprised——

Mr. BLAINE. I beg pardon of the honorable Senator.

Mr. WHYTE. I am surprised to hear the argument going on between these two Senators on a subject which I supposed had been entirely determined, that the reason why we cannot compete with foreign ships is that we cannot build them as cheap.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; we cannot run our ships as cheap without a subsidy as they can theirs with a subsidy. That is the point.

Mr. WHYTE. There are no English subsidies now, except for the Peninsular line.

Mr. BLAINE. Only four and a half million dollars a year. That is all.

Mr. WHYTE. There are no subsidies whatever except to the line that runs to India. I should like my friend to show me one. The Pacific was the last, and England has abandoned that whole theory of subsidizing steamship lines.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator tell me to-day that the English post-office pays to the Cunard and Inman lines that come right into the port of New York the same as we pay them for carrying the mails?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not say that; but I say the theory of subsidy——

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, a subsidy!

> That which we call a rose,
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

They give them two shillings and sixpence per ounce of mail matter, and it foots up to an enormous sum in the course of a year. Call it what you please, the steamship companies do not quarrel with the name so that they get the cash.

Mr. WHYTE. I am not to be diverted from what I was about to say, Mr. President, by the mode of arguing questions which the Senator from Maine has, that of assertion the moment he is driven from a point, and therefore it is almost impossible to cope with him in any argument.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maine will wait till he is driven from his position on this occasion.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I rise with great embarrassment to address the Senate at this hour of the day, and especially after the strong argument which the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] has just made against the proposition contained in these last sections of the post-route bill. It is extremely distasteful to any man of ordinary modesty to address a wearied Senate, and especially to address them at a period of time when they are preparing to spread their wings for their homes; but I should feel myself recreant to duty and feel that I should have no excuse whatever to make to the people who have honored me with a seat upon this floor, if I remained silent in my seat and allowed this amendment appropriating $3,000,000 out of the public Treasury for the purpose of subsidizing two lines of steamships to be added to this bill without at least a feeble protest upon my part against its policy, against its wisdom, against its inequality, against the class legislation which it sets up, and against all the theories to which, in my judgment, the party to which I belong is irrevocably committed.

In the first place, Mr. President, I consider it the grossest piece of unwisdom to add these sections to this post-route bill—unwisdom, because the proposition has in it no novelty; unwisdom, because the experience of our country has demonstrated that it is the veriest folly, neither building up the line to which the fostering care of the Government is extended, nor increasing the commerce of our country, but destroying the fixed channels of trade and breaking up that which is prosperous at the time the subsidy is granted.

It was my experience to have been a short time in the House of Representatives in 1857 and 1858, when this question was discussed, and being present there, I heard it discussed. It was again discussed in 1868 or 1869 in this Chamber, when an effort was made by the Senator from Minnesota, who was then at the head of the Post-Office Committee, (Mr. Ramsey,) to obtain a subsidy for an ocean steam-navigation company. It has been my privilege to hear it discussed, to hear it debated, and to hear to-day the same arguments, with the glare of experience upon our pathway to show us that the arguments will not hold water when subjected to the test of experience.

Mr. President, we have been subsidizing lines since 1843. For the last thirty years this Government has, in larger or smaller degree, held out its hand and opened wide its Treasury to build up, as we were told then, American commerce and to make our country "blossom as the rose." We have tried the experiment not once, not twice, but over and over again; and what is our experience? In every instance, without exception, without a single exception, disastrous failure has followed on the heels of subsidy. Who does not remember with what grand proportions the Collins line of steamers, in 1848 or 1849, started to cross the ocean—midshipmen detailed from the Navy to go on board; all the insignia of the Navy Department thrown around it; all the glare of our country added to its money to enable this line to compete with British steamers in crossing the ocean under the American flag? We started giving them $16,000 a trip, and it ran along for one or two years, and we found them at the doors of the Senate and at the doors of the House of Representatives pleading, like Oliver Twist, for more; and the next year or the second year thereafter doubling our subsidy from $16,000 up to $33,000 a trip, and so on year after year until at last it got to the enormous sum, in 1855, of $858,000, and then they came to Congress and demanded more privileges; they came to Congress and demanded that the United States Government should give up rights that it had under the original Collins contract, and Congress, as Congress generally does, answered to the appeals of the corporation, answered to the appeals of the men that thronged the corridors beseeching for more, answered them by repealing the clauses giving rights to the United States, and leaving the Collins line free from the embarrassment which had been originally put in the act of 1845, and granting additional subsidies, and Franklin Pierce vetoed the bill; and after that, with all the subsidies, they were compelled to withdraw their steamships from the line, and that great enterprise ended in ignominious failure.

That is not the only case. We subsidized a line at the same time, known as the New York and Havre line, and also the German line, running, I believe, under the title of the Ocean Steam Navigation Company. That was subsidized on the 3d of March, 1847, and for a few years it drew its subsidy with singular punctuality; it ran along for a little while; and now what has become of the NewYork and Havre line and the German line? "Gone," in the elegant language of Mr. Fisk, "where the woodbine twineth."

That is not all. Have we not been subsidizing the Pacific Mail line for years and years? Have we not paid from four and a half to five millions of dollars for the ten years prior to the expiration of the contract in 1875? And what is the Pacific Mail Steamship line to-day but a mere bubble blown up on the stock-boards like the soap bubbles of children, one day high in the air and the next day down upon the ground; without any real merit, without any real substance, it is nothing but a speculative stock in the markets of New York.

That is not all. Who can forget the scandals which grew out of that Pacific Mail line in its dealings with Congress in the last few years? Look at our experience with these subsidized steamship lines. What have they done to enhance the honor of the American name, to raise the flag of our country high in the estimation of the world? No; what they have done has been to drag our public men down into the dust and mire, to smirch them with scandal, a reproach to any deliberative body on the face of the earth.

Sir, there were five lines, all of them subsidized by the Government, all of them patronized like children by some overindulgent parent, all of them receiving a fostering hand, all of them receiving kindness from their government, and not one of them is left to tell what became of the flag that floated at their masthead—not one.

Then next, last though not least——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Garrison's line.

Mr. WHYTE. I thank my friend from Delaware; but I was just coming to it—chronologically last, but not least, came Commodore Garrison's Brazilian line of steamers, subsidized in 1864, started in 1865, and lasting for ten years only. Ten years! It seems to be like the life of a ship; a subsidized steamship line never lasts more than a decade of years. It destroys the commerce which it is set up to foster; it ruins the sailing-vessels; it drives them out of the trade into some other, and it just lasts long enough to destroy the very commerce which it was supposed it was to make. That line got $150,000 a year. It expired in September, 1875. Now, what was the experience of that line? Here is your Brazilian line with the same subsidy that you propose now, $150,000, starting more than ten years ago, trying the experiment for ten years; and with the result of that before our eyes, we are asked as sensible men to go and commit the same folly over again. Why, Mr. President, it is incredible; it passes the realms of comprehension that Senators of intelligence, that Senators of mind, that Senators of experience in practical affairs, are appealed to to-day, after ten years of practical operation of a line between New York and Brazil, subsidized with the same subsidy proposed in this bill, sinking as a disastrous failure, to repeat that history and go home to our constituents and explain our reasons for doing it.

But, Mr. President, out of Commodore Garrison's own mouth the declaration came that the line could not live, subsidy or no subsidy; there was no trade to justify it; and the $150,000 a year was not sufficient to run it, and there was nothing beyond that to run it with. Mr. President, lo! that line stopped.

Now, let me give you my own home experience. Right on top of that line came across the water the ships belonging to the great house of King & Co., English merchants, English booksellers of vast wealth, who were engaged in commerce as well as in the publication of books, who had made large fortunes in their experiments as commercial men. They came across the ocean to Baltimore. Why did they come to Baltimore? They saw that Baltimore was one of the largest importing seaports from Brazil. They saw that if there was any place where the trade would be good it would be at Baltimore, because Baltimore had with thirty-odd sailing-vessels been building up for fifty years a trade between Rio and that port. They knew that it was becoming one of the largest coffee-importing places on the Atlantic coast, and they came there determined to start a line of steamers between Rio and Baltimore. The Government thought so too, and the Government transferred its mail from the Garrison line when it stopped to the King line when it started, put the mail on board of these English ships to go to Brazil. Very well; they had large vessels; they had the King Arthur and the Kingfisher of nearly three thousand tons burden. They tried the experiment for us, and made trip after trip. Two or three of the first trips were successful; but when they got to running pretty regularly they found that they had exhausted the stock of coffee in Brazil ready for shipment, and they had to go back to Baltimore with, instead of twenty thousand bags of coffee, six hundred and six thousand bags of coffee. They found that there was no trade to justify a line of steamers of large class between Brazil and the port of Baltimore or any other port on our Atlantic coast.

There is another line, now, besides this Merchants' line, run by these Englishmen, against whom our friend the Senator from Maine seems to have tilted the other day, another line of large steamships have been bringing, whenever they could get an opportunity, cargoes from Rio to the port of New York; but they cannot do it; there is not trade enough to continue it; they have been compelled to abandon it. And so to-day, with the light before us and the experience before us of the utter and disastrous failure of all these subsidy lines, and the failure of lines without subsidy, trying to build up a commerce between Rio and the Atlantic ports, we are asked to be guilty of the same folly again.

Mr. President, these are subsidized lines that have failed. What has become of the unsubsidized lines, not between Brazil and our seaports, because there is not business enough for them, but between Europe and the United States? Take the National line; take the Guion and Williams line; take the Anchor line; take the White Star line, all of them are successful without subsidy; and therefore why should we talk about subsidizing new lines that cannot live with a subsidy when we have the experience to show us that the lines without subsidy are more successful than those with subsidy? Practical experience is against it, I say to my friend from Maine. He may say that England pays a little more for postage than the postage is really worth. So we can pay a little more for postage; but I say that the principle of subsidizing vessels has been abandoned in England, wholly abandoned, abandoned upon full experience, abandoned because they found they could not support subsidized lines, but that they might by paying liberal sea-postage keep a line along. Nobody objects to that; a reasonable price paid for postage nobody will object to; but to talk about paying $150,000 a year for that which now costs the Government $1,200 a year is indefensible, it is unjustifiable, and we have no right to take the money out of the pockets of the people to give to anybody, I do not care whether it be Mr. Roach or anybody else.

Mr. President, this is my view, upon the broad principle that to subsidize a line is not to benefit it, upon the broad principle that it is against good governmental policy to subsidize a line. These are my opinions on that branch of the case, as a mere citizen; as a representative, without any reference to my political affinity; but as a democrat I cannot, I dare not, in my fidelity to my party, as I view it—and I respect the opinions of others who view it otherwise—vote for a subsidy for any steamship line or any corporation.

Sir, if there is any one thing to which the democratic party is pledged, it is to anti-subsidy. When the democratic party obtained control of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress, one of its very first acts was, by a resolution which I hold in my hand, offered by Mr. Holman, of Indiana, to declare—

That in the judgment of this House, in the present condition of the financial affairs of the Government, no subsidies in money, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit, should be granted by Congress to associations or corporations engaged or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises; and that all appropriations from the public Treasury ought to be limited at this time to such amounts only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service.

That was passed by a vote of 223 against 33. Ay, and the republican party in its House of Representatives in 1870, by a unanimous vote, passed identically the same resolution. Now, we are here told to-day that it is right, it is proper in this crucial time of our country, in this hour of its financial embarrassment, in this day of trouble, it is our duty to vote $3,000,000 out of the public Treasury to subsidize a private steamship line between New York and Brazil.

Mr. President, I am opposed to it because it is class legislation of the worst kind. It is legislation in behalf of a single individual. My friend from Texas and my other friend from Louisiana may turn me to this bill and talk to me about advertisement. Advertisement! It is a fraud and a humbug—I do not mean that anybody puts it up as a fraud; I use the word merely in the sense that it deludes. It is a snare and a delusion; that is perhaps the more parliamentary expression. It is a snare; it is a delusion. Every man knows it is adopted from the old Collins bill. It is not new. The Collins men put it in. They knew they had the contract, and that is what they wanted; and so now John Roach has got his $100,000 or $120,000 subsidy from Brazil; he has started his vessels already; and what does your amendment say? That the first steamer shall start on the 1st day of July, and describes it as of three thousand tons burden. Who is there to compete? Who can compete with this Roach? He has got command of the whole cover himself. There are to be two lines; the first steamer is to leave on the 1st of July. Can anybody build a steamer in that time? Can any one buy a steamer across the water? If any one could, could he get it here in time? No. Why not write upon the face of the bill "A bill for the benefit of John Roach," and let the public understand it. That is no way for legislation. No wonder he banqueted us all; no wonder flags were flying at Chester; no wonder that the corks of champagne were heard crack; no wonder we were received with a hospitality worthy of a prince! I did not go, but I speak collectively, of course. My friend from Maine I think was there.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not.

Mr. WHYTE. Well, he went to Chester to make a tariff speech the other day, which was quite as good for Johnny, just as good. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, no wonder with his advantages, with his vessels all ready, with his subsidy on the other side, he was glad to see Congress. He will be much more delighted to see them after this bill passes, in another reception probably, unless he is like some politicians who always forget the favors of the past and are looking for those that are to come in futuro.

Who can doubt that it is for Mr. Roach? The very report of the committee indicates it, if the bill does not:

> The Emperor of Brazil has recognized the absolute necessity of governmental aid for the successful establishment of lines of American steamships between his empire and the United States, against the competition of European lines, all running with the aid of government subsidies.

You see the committee differ from my friend, the Senator from Maine. They call it a subsidy.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not said a word about it.

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, my friend said——

Mr. BLAINE. I was discussing the question of free ships with the Senator from New York. The Senator from Maryland is running along a line parallel with some other person, for whom he is making me stand as a substitute.

Mr. WHYTE. That is absolutely impossible. My friend from Maine can never be substituted by any living human being; he has no parallel and no prototype. I give him credit for originality from stem to stern, speaking in ship language.

Mr. BLAINE. Do not make one in your imagination, then.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no imagination; I always deal with facts. Again the committee say:

> And the emperor has indicated his preference against great opposition from European steamship-owners, and on the 4th of November, 1877, entered into a contract with Messrs. John Roach & Son, of the Morgan Iron Works, New York, for the transportation of the mails from Rio Janeiro, Pará, Pernambuco, and Bahia, to New York City and return, monthly, for the term of ten years, commencing in April, 1878, at a compensation of from $110,000 to $120,000 per year.

There is the whole milk in the cocoanut. John Roach has got $120,000 at that end of the line and he wants $150,000 at this. Why not say so? Of course let him have it! I have not a doubt he is one of the cleverest gentlemen in the country; and if he wants it, we, the representatives of the people, ought to give it to him by all means! But, Mr. President, I do not propose to get into that boat.

Now, then, I say it is against the doctrine of my party, it is against the doctrine of the republican party, and lastly—for I do not intend to keep the Senate, because I know how very disagreeable it is both to the speaker and to the hearers when they are anxious to get away and he knows he is trespassing on their time, ["Go on,"] and therefore I shall not protract this debate ["Go on"] more than long enough to do my duty to my people. That I must do; that I will do; and when I have said all I can say in brief and as near the point as my feeble faculties will enable me, then I shall wisely do as I did during the war: submit and accept the situation.

Now, then, Mr. President, why is the Senate asked to do this gross act—and I do not use language unparliamentary in its character, nor do I mean to be offensive; I only use it as the superlative expression that I can command at the moment? Why should the Senate be guilty of this gross act of favoritism, of favoritism to New Orleans and New York? Why should the Senate of the United States take the hammer, and while building up as they suppose they will, those who vote for this measure, the commerce of New York and the commerce of New Orleans, crush my poor city? Why should Baltimore, that for half a century has been struggling with its fast-sailing clippers, that has been struggling with its light vessels to run to South America and bring coffee to its port, to be distributed to the States of the far West, why should it be ground between the upper and nether mill-stones of New York and New Orleans? Why should this be done? I ask Senators. I appeal to their generosity, I appeal to their magnanimity. Why should they build up that great emporium, New York; why should they pour into its lap the wealth that they anticipate to come from this subsidized line, for the purpose of crushing out that little city at the head of the Chesapeake Bay? We are no rival of theirs; we are no rival of New York or New Orleans. I ask why destroy our commerce, why drive our light vessels from the sea, as the Alabama and the Florida drove American commerce from the ocean? Why, I will not say pirate upon our poor people, but why stretch out your fostering hands to that great city of the North and to that city that sits at the receipt of the customs as vessels pass down the Mississippi out into the Gulf?

Let me ask the Senate for one moment to look at Baltimore's commerce with Rio. In 1874 New York imported 789,891 bags of coffee; Baltimore imported 379,571; New Orleans imported but 149,872. In 1875 New York imported 1,084,386 bags; Baltimore, 670,202; New Orleans, 198,213. In 1876 New York imported 734,981 bags; Baltimore, 475,737; New Orleans, 158,883. New York, in 1877, imported 1,057,496 bags; Baltimore, 513,935; New Orleans, 203,958. Here our city, with its little fleet of sailing-vessels, imported half as much as New York and three times as much as New Orleans; yet you are determined to crush us out, to put steamships on the lines to New Orleans and New York to bring all the coffee there and leave the sailing-vessels of Baltimore engaged in this traffic for half a century to turn their prows away from this foreign commerce and coast along the shores of the State and pick up the little freight that they can pick up in that coastwise traffic. And you, men of the West, to whom the port of Baltimore has been of late years a blessed outlet, to whom through the port of Baltimore much of the materials that have gone into your work have been imported to make your wealth, you are asked to destroy the commerce of that city, to build up and subsidize lines of steamships which will wipe from the face of the ocean every vessel that has been in the habit of sailing out of Baltimore to these Brazilian ports.

Again, let me show Senators a statement just made up to the 1st of May, 1878, of the exports to Brazilian ports from the port of Baltimore. My friend from Texas beautifully portrayed that rich and flourishing State, a State in which we all have pride, a State in which we all take undying interest. He spoke of this measure as opening up its commerce, opening up an outlet for its flour. Of course it will; and as it opens up that flour trade to that great State, while it may be built up, while it may put electricity in its veins and impart life to its trade, as it gives to Galveston and to Texas life, it stabs in the very vitals the port of Baltimore and that rich and growing region of country in Maryland which others I am sure would not wish to injure.

Exports to Brazilian ports from May 1, 1877, to May 1, 1878, from the port of Baltimore.

Articles.	Rio de Janeiro.	Pernambuco.	Santos.	Total.
Flour, barrels	235,981	44,696	3,185	283,862
Lard, pounds	3,854,934	80,167	20,335	3,955,436
Lumber, feet	373,168	.....	.....	373,168
Kerosene, gallons	1,000	.....	.....	1,000
Resin, barrels	.....	653	.....	653
Corn, bushels	13,099	4,278	.....	17,377

It will be seen from this statement that there were sent from Baltimore to Brazil last year nearly three hundred thousand barrels of flour by these little sailing-vessels that run down there in twenty-six or twenty-seven days.

The imports from Rio de Janeiro to Baltimore from May 1, 1877, to May 1, 1878, were 445,028 bags of coffee.

This is our trade, and this is our trade which we are to have sacrificed.

Mr. President, one word more. The merchants of Baltimore have appealed to you, those merchants whose names are known all over the country, whose names are known in foreign lands, men like Alexander Brown & Sons, Thomas Whitridge, E. Levering & Co., and Robert A. Fisher & Co., men who for nearly three quarters of a century have been engaged in this trade. They appeal to you not to subsidize these vessels; they appeal to you upon the ground that you will destroy a commerce already existing and not build up that commerce which you anticipate by the passage of this bill. They tell you this remarkable thing also that since the Garrison line failed we have had a telegraphic cable from Rio, and by that cable all the communications are made between their correspondents in Rio and the merchants on this coast, so that the coming of letters is a mere matter of detail. The facts are communicated by a telegraph code which they understand; they are communicated so that they know what is coming, they know how to sell, they know all the changes in the market hour after hour; and when the letters come nine out of ten are never read; they are handed to the clerks, because the whole of them have been anticipated by the telegraphic cable.

That is not all. Remarkable to say, these lines of steamers are only to run in twenty-five days to Rio. They do not profess that they are going to run any faster. Twenty-five days to Rio! Now, I know myself of a vessel, the Paladin, that has made the voyage in twenty-seven days, and this memorial states that another vessel has made the voyage in twenty-six days.

Mr. THURMAN. Sailing-vessels?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, the sailing ones. The Paladin has made the voyage in twenty-seven days; another vessel, referred to in this very memorial, has made the trip a day shorter, in twenty-six days.

Mr. EATON. There are to be twelve round trips a year; therefore they cannot consume twenty-five days in each trip. There are to be twelve round trips in the year.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I wish to remind him that the first steamer which has been run under this company that he has so characterized as Roach & Co., has made the trip in twenty-three days.

Mr. WHYTE. In twenty-three days. Yes, that is her trial trip, and I will venture to affirm they put the steam on to show what she could do, to let you all know that she could make three days over our sailing-vessels.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator understands anything about commerce, he knows that the trial trip is not always the best trip.

Mr. WHYTE. I know that when a man wants to get a subsidy he will make his vessel run up to the top of the ladder, just as fast as she can go; and some of them put resin in the fires for the purpose of making more steam. They will blow it up if it is necessary to get a good big subsidy. [Laughter.]

Mr. WITHERS. My friend will permit an interruption a moment. He denies that the English government pay any subsidy to their vessels. In other words the amount they pay for carrying the mails is not a subsidy; but when we propose to pay extra for carrying mails, that is a subsidy! I want to know wherein the distinction exists between the two cases.

Mr. WHYTE. It is a very simple distinction. When they pay a subsidy they pay an enormous sum; but when they take the subsidy off they pay a comparatively small sum, a little more than the ordinary postage.

Mr. WITHERS. My friend does not undertand the point of my inquiry; no doubt it is my own fault. He denies that the English pay any subsidies to their vessels and asserts that it is simply extra compensation for carrying the mails. This bill provides that we shall pay compensation for carrying these mails upon an advertised rate; and that he denounces as a subsidy. Now, if it is a subsidy in one case, it strikes me it is a subsidy in the other; and if not in the one case, it is not in the other.

Mr. WHYTE. The difference is this: the English government paid as a subsidy $2,250,000 when they paid as a subsidy; when they take the subsidy off and pay for carrying the mails they reduce it to about $400,000. That is the difference exactly; and there is not a single line now except the Oriental and Peninsular line that is actually subsidized by Great Britain.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WHYTE. I shall soon get through, and then somebody else can take the floor. I do not want to be occupying the whole time of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. Just one word.

Mr. WHYTE. I will yield for twenty words.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator says that when an extravagant payment is made, that is a subsidy. I find that the contract price from Fort Worth to Yuma, in the Territory of Arizona, a distance of five hundred miles, is $134,000. Does the Senator consider that a subsidy?

Mr. WHYTE. I am not talking about what has been done in the United States in regard to your western Territories.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is the present contract.

Mr. WHYTE. You have been getting millions of acres of land for your railroads. I know it all; but I never voted for one of them, and I would not vote for one of them to-day. Is not the cry going up from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that the whole western country has almost been taken away from the settlers and given to corporations? I know it.

Mr. PADDOCK. This line to which I referred is not a railroad line; it is under the star service, performed by coaches, by four-horse coaches instead of on horseback or buckboard, as formerly was the custom.

Mr. WHYTE. I have not a doubt about it that we pay an enormous sum for carrying the mails through the West, and I know more than that, that notwithstanding what we paid in the past we have Holladay claims and all sorts of claims here for additional pay in excess of what they have already got. I know all that. More than that, Mr. President, that is real pay for actual service done in a country where it is dangerous to carry on the transportation of mails and express matter.

But, Mr. President, let us see the justice of this. Suppose I submit to my friends who are supporting this bill a little amendment to it. Let us see whether it is intended to build up commerce. I will submit to my friends a proposition to amend this bill and to insert on line 6, page 92, between the words "ply" and "between" the word "alternately," and after "New York" on the same line "and city of Baltimore." Let us have three lines. I think that is fair if you are going to dispense benefits. Now, take up the list of imports—take up the sea-ports that are dealing with Brazil, and you find Baltimore standing in between New York and New Orleans, having half the imports that New York has and three times as much as New Orleans; and if you are going to run steamship lines, suppose you put Baltimore right in between. That she is entitled to.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] asks me if I will vote for it. He does not suppose I am going to answer that question. Does he think I am going to put a contract of that kind in writing? Not exactly.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to ask my friend from Maryland if the bill is amended so as to run a steamer alternately to Baltimore and New York, will he support the bill?

Mr. WHYTE. No, I will not. I am only testing your sense of justice, that is all, so that I can go before the people and say it was a subsidy for John Roach and nobody else.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator give way for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. FERRY. I hope not.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will give way for a motion for an executive session.

Mr. THURMAN. We cannot get through with this bill to-day, and we might as well go into executive session.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I think we had better adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 4, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. O. P. FITZGERALD, of San Francisco, California.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, by request of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] who is absent on account of sickness.

There being no objection,

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5121) extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. FULLER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands, in order that the report may be printed and the bill recommitted, the bill (H. R. No. 3544) to forfeit certain public lands granted to aid in the construction of certain railroad and telegraph lines.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be ordered accordingly.

Subsequently,

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama said: Mr. Speaker, I objected a few moments ago to the report which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FULLER] desired to present from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That bill includes railroads whose title has not been forfeited, railroads that have complied with every condition of the law; and I do not want it to go out over the country that they have forfeited their title or that there has ever been such a bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The proposition was merely to recommit the bill to the committee of which the gentleman from Alabama is a member, the purpose being merely to have the report printed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make my objection because I do not want an incorrect statement in regard to those railroad companies to go out to the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection; but if the gentleman says he rose to object the Chair will of course recognize him as being in time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Well, sir, I object.

Mr. FULLER. I raise the point of order that the objection comes too late. The matter had been disposed of and the House had gone to another and entirely different matter.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Alabama rise in time to object?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rose to address the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient.

LIEUTENANT JAMES T. LEAVY.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to report, with an amendment, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a joint resolution for the relief of an insane Army officer.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) authorizing the payment of the accounts of Lieutenant James T. Leavy, an insane officer, was read. It recites in the preamble that the pay account of First Lieutenant and Brevet Captain James T. Leavy, United States Army, retired, is in an unsettled condition by reason of his insanity, there being mutual indebtedness between said Leavy and the Government; the joint resolution therefore directs the Paymaster-General to adjust the pay accounts of Leavy and pay the balance, if any, found to be due him out of any moneys appropriated for the pay of the Army.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the word "pay," in the fifth line, and insert the following:

Out of any moneys appropriated for the pay of the Army, the balance, if any, found to be due him on account of salary during the time his name was omitted from the Army Register on account of his request to be wholly retired, which request was made by him while insane.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, Lieutenant Leavy having been examined by a retiring board and found to be insane, was retired from active service by paragraph 14, Special Orders No. 182, dated Adjutant-General's Office, July 31, 1868, on account of said insanity, and confined in the Government Hospital for the Insane. After remaining under treatment for several months he was permitted to leave the hospital to be cared for by his mother, and subsequently at his own request he was wholly retired and his name thenceforward omitted from the Army Register, by paragraph 4, Special Orders No. 151, dated Adjutant-General's Office, June 23, 1869, whereupon he was paid one year's pay and allowances.

Application was made for his restoration to the retired list on the ground that he was insane when he asked to be wholly retired. A board of medical officers, consisting of the Assistant Surgeon-General and two full surgeons of the Army, was convened by the honorable Secretary of War to inquire and determine as to his mental condition at the time he applied to be wholly retired. This board found that he was insane at that time and had been ever since. The matter was then referred to the Attorney-General, and Special Orders No. 69, dated Adjutant-General's Office, April 2, 1878, was issued from the War Department. Paragraph 9 of that order reads as follows, to wit:

By direction of the President, in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General, the order of June 23, 1869, from this office wholly retiring First Lieutenant James T. Leavy, Seventh United States Cavalry, is declared void, Lieutenant Leavy having been insane when he requested it. Lieutenant Leavy's name is by direction of the President restored to the retired list, in accordance with paragraph 14, Special Orders No. 182, July 31, 1868, from this office.

By command of General Sherman, &c.

It will be remembered that Special Orders No. 182, just referred to, was the order which retired Lieutenant Leavy in the first instance; hence he is returned to his original status on the retired list under that order. A portion of the time involved in the settlement of his pay accounts covers a period for which no funds are available, as the law requires all unexpended balances to be covered into the Treasury within two years.

The House joint resolution No. 169 only authorizes the adjustment of this officer's accounts in accordance with existing laws, and is in accordance with the views of the honorable Secretary of War. It simply facilitates a settlement by making funds already appropriated available for his pay, covering a period for which all unexpended appropriations have been covered into the Treasury.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONFIRMATION OF TITLE.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to put upon its passage at this time the bill (H. R. No. 3980) to confirm the title to the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 7, township 81 north, range 4 east of the fifth principal meridian, Clinton County, Iowa.

The bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Public Lands. It merely changes a single word.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas John M. Knott presumed that he had applied for and entered from the United States, on the the 29th of February, A. D. 1848, the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 7, in township 81 north, range 4 east of the fifth principal meridian, in Clinton County, Iowa; and

Whereas said John M. Knott soon thereafter entered into possession and occupancy of said land, and has continued to occupy said land through his grantees to the present; and

Whereas said application through mistake described the land as being in range 3 east, instead of 4 east; and

Whereas the Department of the Interior, under letter dated February 19, A. D. 1876, has decided that said land, in range 4, is within the limits of the Iowa Central Air Line (now the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River) Railroad, and that the said tract of land inured to said road by virtue of the grant of land to the railroad aforesaid, under the act of Congress approved May 15, A. D. 1856; and

Whereas the said Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad, by deed dated November 17, A. D. 1876, now on file in the General Land Office, has released and surrendered unto the United States all the right and claim said company now has, or may acquire, to the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 7, township 81 north, range 4 east of the fifth principal meridian, upon the express condition that the United States will issue a patent unto the said John M. Knott for said land last described, to the end that his said grantees may be protected in their rights: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the deed to the United States from the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad to said land be accepted, and that a patent issue to the said John M. Knott for the same.

Mr. DUNNELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa to drop the whereases of the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. If that is done, the whole body of the bill would have to be remodeled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Where does this bill come from?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The Committee on Public Lands recommend it unanimously.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. COX, of New York, said: I withdraw my objection to the bill in charge of the gentleman from Iowa, if it can be passed without debate.

There being no further objection, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, and moved that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. Those amendments have not yet been considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill was returned from the Senate with amendments and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It now comes back from that committee with the recommendation that the amendments be non-concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TENTS, ETC., FOR TEXAS VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to Governor Hubbard, of Texas, such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the volunteers of the State at their summer encampment be put upon its passage. The governor of Texas is to have a drill of the volunteer force of the State and desires to borrow some tents from San Antonio, giving bonds for a return of the property.

The joint resolution was read. It directs the Secretary of War to turn over to Governor Hubbard, of Texas, such tents, poles, and pins as he may require, and as may be in the quartermaster's department at San Antonio, Texas, for the use of the volunteers of said State at their summer encampment for 1878. The quartermaster at San Antonio, Texas, shall take a good and sufficient bond for the return of such property in good condition after said encampment.

There being no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5, after the word "pins," insert "and camp and garrison equipage."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEEBE. Should there not be a provision incorporated leaving the turning over of this property within the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. MILLS. I agree to that, and move to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War approve thereof.

The amendment was adopted.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARINE DANGER-SIGNAL.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 4675, a bill (H. R. No. 5122) to test a marine danger-signal; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That is understood.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 766) to legalize certain patents issued to members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians.

Mr. EDEN. I must object to going on with bills in this irregular way. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4931) to provide for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress in the State of West Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on the second Tuesday of October, 1878, there shall be elected in each congressional district in the State of West Virginia one Representative to represent said State of West Virginia in the Forty-sixth Congress.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think there ought to be some reasons given for this proposed departure from the general law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I can state the reason in a very few words. The convention of the State of West Virginia was in session at the time of the passage of the law of 1872 requiring congressional elections to be held on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November. The constitution of the State of West Virginia was adopted a few days after the passage of the general law, but without a knowledge on the part of that State that the law had passed. The constitution accordingly provides a date different from that of the general law; and this bill is necessary to enable the election to be held on the day provided in the constitution.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATENTS TO POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw my objection to the bill in charge of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.]

Mr. RYAN. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to legalize certain patents issued to members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That the patents issued April 15, 1871, to certain Pottawatomie Indians in the State of Kansas, under the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, of November 15, 1861, and the sixth and eighth articles of the treaty between the United States and said tribe of Indians, concluded February 27, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be valid and in full force and effect to the same extent as they would have been had said patentees become naturalized citizens of the United States prior to the issuing of said patents: Provided, That this act shall only apply to patents for lands for which conveyances have been made in good faith by the patentees subsequent to the issuing of their patents.

There being no further objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NANNIE HALL.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 1174) for the relief of Nannie Hall, in order that it may be considered at the present time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the claim of Nannie Hall, formerly widow of Lieutenant Frederick J. Denman, of the United States Army, for the proceeds of cotton alleged to have been seized and sold by agents of the United States, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication according to law and the practice of said court, without regard to the statute of limitation.

Mr. SINGLETON. A word in explanation of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold the objection in reserve until after the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Senate passed that bill unanimously. It was reported by Senator HOAR, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the Judiciary Committee has made a favorable report to that committee on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up and read a first and second time.

Mr. FRYE. I only wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have examined this bill with care, and reported in its favor to the Judiciary Committee. That report has been unanimously adopted, and I have been instructed by the committee to make the motion to take this bill from the Speaker's table and to put it on its passage. This is the widow of a Union officer, and it is all right.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBERTS. I demand the regular order of business, and call up the unfinished business of last evening, which is the life-saving-service bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] in relation to internal revenue.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I desire to raise the question of consideration between the unfinished business and the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the unfinished business is really the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to internal revenue.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand, however, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois consents we shall have a morning hour for reports from committees.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the House desires a morning hour, of course I shall not object.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was understood on the part of the gentleman from Illinois that the life-saving-service bill should come up this morning and be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. If there is a morning hour the life-saving-service bill will come up immediately afterward under the order of the House. The original resolution was that the previous question should be called after the morning hour of Tuesday; that is, after the morning hour this day.

Mr. COX, of New York. The morning hour has not yet been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The best way to reach the regular order is to have a morning hour. The Chair states further the gentleman having charge of the life-saving-service bill does not antagonize the morning hour.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection, provided that the bill in reference to internal revenue shall keep its place.

The SPEAKER. It will not lose its place.

Mr. KNOTT. I call then for the regular order.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes to twelve o'clock m., and reports are in order from the Committee on the Judiciary.

LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. KNOTT reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1548) for the relief of the owners and purchasers of land sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS WITH RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. HARTRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 951, a bill (H. R. No. 5123) to provide for the final settlement of the accounts of the United States with certain railway companies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Mr. HARTRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (S. No. 330) explanatory of section 1889 of the Revised Statutes, and to ratify and confirm certain territorial legislation, and for other purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides that the words "the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges" in section 1889 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be construed as prohibiting the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories of the United States from creating towns, cities, or other municipal corporations, and providing for the government of the same, and conferring upon them the corporate powers and privileges necessary to their local administration, by either general or special acts; and that all general and special acts of such Legislative Assemblies heretofore passed creating and providing for the government of towns, cities, or other municipal corporations, and conferring such rights, powers, and privileges upon the same as were necessary to their local administration, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed and declared to be valid, any law to the contrary notwithstanding, subject, however, to amendment or repeal hereafter by such territorial Assemblies. But nothing herein shall have the effect to create any private right, except that of holding and executing municipal offices, or to divest any such right, or to make valid or invalid any contract or obligation heretofore made by or on behalf of any such town, city, or other municipal corporation, or to authorize any such corporation to incur hereafter any debt or obligation other than such as shall be necessary to the administration of its internal affairs.

Mr. EDEN. Does that refer to any other than municipal corporations?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Nothing but municipal corporations. Unless some explanation is asked I shall demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4196) relating to the election of Representatives from North Carolina to the Forty-sixth Congress.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas doubts are entertained whether due provision has been made in the statutes of North Carolina for holding an election for Representatives from that State to the Forty-sixth Congress: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That an election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1878, for such Representatives, conducted by the sheriffs or by other persons duly appointed therefor, in like manner as elections for members of the General Assembly of said State, and according to the provisions of an act of the General Assembly of said State entitled "An act to regulate elections," ratified the 12th day of March, 1877, and also of an act of the General Assembly of said State entitled "An act to regulate the manner of making election returns," ratified the 6th day of March, 1877, shall be deemed lawful and valid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM COLORADO.

Mr. LAPHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3747, a bill (H. R. No. 5124) designating the time for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth and succeeding Congresses from the State of Colorado; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the election of a Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress from the State of Colorado shall be upon the day fixed by the constitution of said State for the election of its governor and other State officers in the year 1878; and that Representatives from said State to all succeeding Congresses shall be elected upon the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, as now provided in section 25 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and repeals all laws in conflict therewith.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HALE. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAPHAM) if this bill leaves the next election for Representatives in Congress to come off in October next.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Let me make a statement.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will say that this bill is necessary by reason of the doubt growing out of the discussion in this House in the Colorado case as to when the election in the current year for a Representative in Congress shall be held in Colorado. The enabling act of Colorado provided that the State constitution should fix the time, and the time fixed in that constitution is a day in October. To elect a Representative to Congress on that day in this year will save the expense of holding two elections in that State. After this year the bill provides for the election of Representatives from Colorado on the day fixed by the general law, the Tuesday after the first Monday in November. This bill has the approval of the Representative on this floor from Colorado, and I believe there is no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. The only point I want settled is that there shall be no dispute about it hereafter; is that the congressional election in Colorado for this year is to be held in October next. Is there any doubt about that? Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]——

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me to make a short statement?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] is mistaken when he says that the necessity for this bill arises out of an uncertainty existing in Colorado as to the day upon which the election of the next Representative should be held. When I prepared the substitute which the gentleman now reports back from the Committee on the Judiciary with their recommendation, I did it because we would be compelled to hold two elections in Colorado the coming fall unless such a measure became a law.

In the discussion of the contest from Colorado at the opening of the session, members will recollect that the principal legal dispute was concerning the proper interpretation of section 6 of the act to enable Colorado to form a constitution and State government. The democracy of the State and the democratic members of the House contended that the section conferred no power upon the constitutional convention to fix a time for the election of any Representative, but the first to which the State would be entitled and that all after the first should be elected at the time fixed by the act of Congress for the election of Representatives from all the States, and that the convention having fixed the first Tuesday of October, 1876, for the election of "one" Representative, the member to the Forty-fourth Congress was the one referred to, and that the member to the Forty-fifth Congress should be elected in November.

The republican members of the House and my competitor contended otherwise. They averred that section 25 of the Revised Statutes, so far as it related to Colorado, had been repealed by section 6 of the enabling act, and that the constitutional convention not only had the power to fix a day until 1880 for the election of Representatives, but had actually exercised it, and had fixed the first Tuesday in October as that day. It would be interesting to refer at this time to the speeches of the advocates of my competitor's claim during the contest, and to show how emphatic were their views upon this point. But it might be claimed that these utterances were in the heat of debate and not the result of calm reflection and investigation, so I will forego quotations from them, but shall call your attention to the deliberate utterances of the minority of the Election Committee reporting in favor of my competitor, and also to the deliberate utterances of my competitor himself. I have a purpose in this. I desire to show you that the Legislature of Colorado, which was two-thirds republican in both branches, by solemn act and long before this Congress met or the contest was before it, decided that no such interpretation could be given to the law; that the constitutional convention did not and could not fix a time other than November for the election of Representatives, after the first one; that the Legislature had no power to fix any other time, and that the democratic construction of the law was right and the republican construction wrong.

In the answer of my competitor to the notice of contest served upon him by me, he gives as the legal basis of his right to the controverted seat the following. I read from his answer as found in the record of the case:

And this respondent, further answering, says that by reason of the passage of said enabling act Colorado was excepted from the provisions of the act of 1872 and that until the next census the fixing of the time for the election of a Representative in the Congress of the United States was vested in the constitutional convention of said State; and this respondent says that said constitutional convention, pursuant to the provisions of section 6 of the enabling act, fixed the 3d day of October, A. D. 1876, as the day for the election of a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress.

The act of 1872 referred to is section 25 of the Revised Statutes, which fixed November 7 as the day for electing Representatives.

I now quote from a printed statement made by him early in 1877 and forwarded to each member of this body, in which he sets forth the basis of his claim to the seat:

The enabling act as clearly excepted Colorado from the operations of the act of Congress of 1872 as Ohio, Indiana, and New Hampshire are excepted, because it provided that until the next census, 1880, the Representative should be elected at a time to be fixed by the constitutional convention.

I now quote from the report of the minority of the Election Committee of the House, favoring my competitor's right to the seat:

Our conclusions and argument are supported by the fact if Colorado could not elect to this House in October, 1876, she could not at all. If we are right in the construction we have given section 6 of the enabling act, it is in conflict with the act of Congress designating the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, biennially, for the election of Representatives, and being the later law, repeals it as to Colorado. And, as we have shown, the enabling act limited the election of Representatives to the day of the election of State officers, the first Tuesday in October in each year.

And yet, notwithstanding all of these bold assertions that it was the duty of the constitutional convention to fix the day for electing Representatives until 1880, and that article 5, section 44, of the State constitution fixed the first Tuesday of October for such elections until 1880, as I will now show you, the Legislature of Colorado in effect denies it all, and asserts that neither it nor the constitutional convention possessed such power and could provide for no other than the first Representative to which the State was entitled.

I now quote from the general election law of Colorado, approved March 8, 1877. Section 7 reads as follows:

SEC. 7. At the general election A. D. 1878, and every alternate year thereafter, there shall be elected the following State officers, to wit: one governor, one lieutenant-governor, one secretary of state, one State treasurer, one auditor of state, one superintendent of public instruction, and two regents of the university. * * * Also on the first Monday of November, A. D. 1878, and every alternate year thereafter, there shall be elected the number of Representatives in Congress to which the State may be entitled.

Sir, for what does this section provide? That in 1878 (the present year) the governor and other State officers shall be elected in October and the Representative in November. Why is this? Why did the Legislature of Colorado require that within a single month two general elections should be held in the State? Some great reason must have existed to induce the Legislature of Colorado to tax its people not less than $30,000 for an election in November. If the constitutional convention had fixed the first Tuesday of October until 1880 as the day for electing one Representative, why or by what authority did our legislation change the time to November? If the constitutional convention had authority to authorize the State Legislature to fix a time until 1880 for electing Representatives, why did that Legislature provide for an election of State officers in October and for the election of a Representative in November? There is but one reason. The constitutional convention fixed the time for the election of the first Representative only. It had authority to fix it for no other. The Legislature had no authority to fix any time for such election in conflict with the general law of Congress upon the subject, and, as that law fixed the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1876, for the election of a Representative to the Forty-fifth Congress, and upon the same day every two years thereafter for succeeding Congresses, neither the constitutional convention of Colorado nor the State Legislature could alter that time.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, do my political enemies rise up unthinkingly and reluctantly to justify the democracy of my State and the democratic members of this House in their action upon that contest. By the act of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, overwhelmingly republican, and which met long before the controverted questions were debated upon this floor, the principal legal questions involved in the controversy have been decided as maintained by my friends and myself. I do not enter now upon other questions that were involved. I refer only to the law. I desire to set the record right in every proper way as time marches forward. The people of Colorado are familiar with all the issues involved in that controversy, and no amount of newspaper misrepresentation can hide from them the glaring fact that in Colorado, in the year 1876, while plans were on foot in other States to steal the Presidency, members of that same political party, by bluff and the intimidation of State and county officials and the arrogance begotten by a long lease of power within it, were endeavoring to steal a Representative into this body without submitting his claims to the voice of the people made manifest upon the day required by the supreme law of the land. That I stood between that wicked conspiracy and its consummation is the proudest act of my short political life. I am willing to make the issue here or elsewhere, and stand or fall by it, as the people of my State shall declare.

It is this act of the Legislature of Colorado and the act of Congress which render the bill now before the House necessary. Under our State constitution our State officers must be elected the present year in October, and the interests of the tax-payers of Colorado demand that the Representative should be elected at the same time. Hence, I sincerely hope that the bill will pass.

Mr. LAPHAM. I do not think I can yield any further; there is no objection to this bill.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] raise any question that under this bill the election for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from Colorado must be held in October next?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The election must take place under this bill in October.

Mr. HALE. I am glad to have that settled so that there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The bill settles that.

Mr. LAPHAM. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTION OF MUNICIPAL AND COUNTY BUILDINGS.

Mr. LAPHAM, from the same committee, reported back, with a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 3167) exempting municipal and county buildings used as such from levy and sale.

The substitute was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That in all cases when lots of ground and buildings owned by any city, town, or county, and used by such city, town, or county for municipal or county purposes, are exempt from levy and sale under process from State courts, they shall also be exempt from such levy and sale by virtue of process from the courts of the United States.

Mr. LAPHAM. As will be seen, this bill simply provides that the exemption provided by the laws of the State in regard to property used for municipal or other public purposes shall be held to obtain upon process issued from the Federal courts.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUITS UPON OFFICIAL BONDS.

Mr. LAPHAM, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 216, a bill (H. R. No. 5125) to limit the time within which suits upon official bonds shall be brought; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that section 786 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 786. No suit on an official bond given by any officer of the United States or any department of the Government thereof, except where otherwise specially provided by law, shall be maintained unless such suit shall be commenced within six years after the right of action accrues, saving, however, the rights of married women, infants, and insane persons, so that they sue within three years after the disability has been removed: Provided, That in all cases where the right of action has already accrued or the disability has ceased the party shall have three years from and after the passage of this act in which to commence an action: Provided also, That within two years after the default of any officer giving such bond shall be known to the officer or department of the Government having the custody of the same, notice of such default shall be given to the surety or sureties upon such bond, or they shall be discharged from all liability thereon.

Mr. LAPHAM. The section of the Revised Statutes which it is proposed to amend provides a limitation upon the bond of marshal alone. This bill makes the limitation upon all official bonds uniform in every department of the Government. We add a proviso which we deem wise and necessary—that within two years after the default of the principal upon an official bond the officer of the department of the Government having custody of the bond shall give notice to the sureties of the default or they shall be discharged from further liability—thus making the principle uniform and securing the rights of sureties by notice within two years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT JUDGE, WESTERN DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2319) to provide for the appointment of a district judge for the western district of Tennessee.

The bill and amendment were read.

Mr. FOSTER. Should not this bill receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. KNOTT. I hope the gentleman will not make that point. I know he will not after he hears a statement of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I will reserve the point till the gentleman makes his explanation.

Mr. KNOTT. The western district of Tennessee is already established by law, but it has no judge. Twice as much business is done in that district as in both the others. All the admiralty business of the State is done there. The judge who is required to do the admiralty business for the three districts of Tennessee resides nearly five hundred miles from the place of holding the admiralty court. It is an absolute necessity that there should be a judge for this district, and I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the bill authorize the appointment of an additional judge?

Mr. KNOTT. It does; but the district is already organized by law, and all the machinery for carrying on the court is now in existence.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to allow an amendment locating this court at Humboldt, in the county of Gibson. It is a flourishing young city; centrally located; accessible from every point of the district, and willing and anxious to afford every facility and convenience for the sessions of the court. I hope the gentleman will let the amendment be voted on.

Mr. KNOTT. I would gladly, if I could, admit the amendment the gentleman suggests. But the committee have carefully considered the point at which the court shall be held, and they believe that they have fixed the right place in the bill.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to amend the bill by adding thereto the words, "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURT AT FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

Mr. KNOTT, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 431) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana.

The bill was read.

Mr. HANNA. I move to amend by striking out the word "State" before the word "county" in the last section of the bill, so as to provide that these courts "shall be held in a building to be provided for the purpose by the county or city authorities without expense to the United States."

Mr. KNOTT. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a single question. The bill provides, as I understand, for holding circuit or district courts at Fort Wayne, Indiana, which I believe is in the circuit with Illinois and Wisconsin. I will ask the gentleman whether he has had his attention called to the fact that the circuit judge for that district is now from three to four years behind in his business, and as to whether that judge can hold this court in addition to his other duties.

Mr. KNOTT. I will say the holding of the court at Fort Wayne will not increase the business at all. He will have no more business to perform than he has now.

Mr. CASWELL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman accept an amendment for the appointment of an additional judge for that circuit?

Mr. KNOTT. No, sir; I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HANNA'S amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT COURT, CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 4024) to provide for holding a term of the district court of the United States at the city of Charlotte, North Carolina, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of North Carolina shall hereafter be held in the city of Charlotte, in said State, and that said terms shall commence respectively on —— of —— and —— of —— in each and every year. That this act take effect from and after its passage.

The amendments, which were read, were to insert in the blanks "the second Monday of June" and "the second Monday of December."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 3429, the bill (H. R. No. 5125) to amend an act for the relief of Robert Erwin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GARDINER AND RICHMOND PORTS OF DELIVERY.

Mr. FRYE also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4989) to amend section 2517 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 2517 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended by inserting in article 10, after the works "Bowdoinham," the words "Gardiner and Richmond."

Mr. FRYE. This is rendered necessary. Section 2517 of the Revised Statutes provides:

Tenth. The district of Bath; in which Bath shall be the port of entry and Hallowell, Pittston, Georgetown, Brunswick, and Bowdoinham ports of delivery.

Pittston and Georgetown have been divided and the cities of Gardiner and Richmond created out of the divided territory, and therefore it becomes necessary to insert them as ports of delivery, they being ship-building cities.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FRYE also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3895) to amend section 349 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that section 349 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 349. There shall be in the Department of Justice a Solicitor of the Treasury, an assistant solicitor of the Treasury, a Solicitor of Internal Revenue, a Naval Solicitor, an examiner of claims for the State Department, and an Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, and shall be entitled to the following salaries: The Solicitor of the Treasury, to $4,000 a year; the assistant solicitor of the Treasury, to $3,000 a year; the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, to $5,000 a year; the Naval Solicitor, to $3,500 a year; the examiner of claims for the Department of State, to $4,000 a year; and the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, to $4,000 a year.

The second section provides that section 390 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. FRYE. I will state what the bill is. This bill creates, Mr. Speaker, no new office, changes no salary, and makes no new salary whatever. It simply transfers the Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, and attaches him to the Department of Justice. That is all the bill does.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAL EMPLOYÉS EXEMPTED FROM JURY SERVICE.

Mr. FRYE also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2019) to exempt employés in the postal service from militia and jury service.

The bill, which was read, provides that all persons employed in any branch of the postal service shall be exempt from militia duty and from serving on juries, or from any penalty for neglect thereof.

Mr. FRYE. This corrects a mistake in the Revised Statutes, those words having been dropped out in the revision.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT TOLEDO.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 380) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Toledo, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a term of the circuit court and district court for the northern district of Ohio shall be held at Toledo, in said State, on the first Tuesday of the months of June and December in each year; and one grand jury and one petit jury only shall be summoned, and serve in both of said courts at each term thereof. And the existing provisions of law fixing the times of holding the district court at Toledo are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. Said northern district shall be, and hereby is, divided into two divisions, to be known as the eastern and western division of the northern district of Ohio. The western division shall consist of twenty-four counties, to wit: Williams, Defiance, Paulding, Van Wert, Mercer, Auglaize, Allen, Putnam, Henry, Fulton, Lucas, Wood, Hancock, Hardin, Logan, Union, Delaware, Marion, Wyandot, Seneca, Sandusky, Ottawa, Erie, and Huron; and the eastern division shall consist of the remaining counties in said district. But no additional clerk or marshal shall be appointed in said district.

SEC. 3. All suits not of a local nature in the circuit and district courts, against a single defendant, inhabitant of such State, must be brought in the division of the district where he resides; but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different divisions of the district, such suits may be brought in either division. All issues of fact in such suits shall be tried at a term of the court held in the division where the suit is so brought.

SEC. 4. All offenses committed in either of the subdivisions shall be cognizable and indictable within said division.

SEC. 5. Actions or proceedings now pending at Cleveland, in said district, which would under this act be brought in the western division of said district, may be transferred, by consent of all the parties, to said western division; and in case of such transfer, all papers and files therein, with copies of all journal entries, shall be transferred to the deputy clerk's office at Toledo; and the same shall be proceeded with in all respects as though it originally commenced in the western division.

SEC. 6. All grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division. All mesne and final process, subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or both of the divisions.

SEC. 7. This act shall be in force from and after the 1st day of September, A. D. 1878. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Representative of the Toledo district [Mr. COX] is now serving on a committee. I ask that the consideration of the bill be delayed until he can be present. At least I desire that some member of the committee shall explain the nature of the change made by the bill.

Mr. KNOTT. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] must be aware, there is already a term of court authorized to be held at Toledo. I will state what is the change made by this bill. It divides the district into two divisions, making the causes which originate in a certain division cognizable at Toledo, and those originating in another division cognizable at Cleveland. A term of court is authorized to be held at Toledo. That I understand to be agreeable to Judge Swayne, of the Supreme Court, who resides in that city and desires this change to be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. What are the boundaries of the divisions?

Mr. KNOTT. I could not of course undertake to enumerate the counties, but they are specified in the bill. There are twenty-four counties in one division and the remaining counties in the district constitute the other division.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Clerk again to read the description of the divisions by counties.

Mr. KNOTT. Before the Clerk reads, I will say to my friend from Ohio that the Representative from the Toledo district desires this bill to pass. He so informed me, and it was on his motion that the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should like to have the section read.

Mr. KNOTT. We are pressed for time, having other reports to make from the Judiciary Committee, and I hope the reading will not be insisted upon. The Representative from that district is exceedingly anxious that this bill should pass.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. As the Representative of the southern part of the district, I wish to know where we are going to, whether to Toledo or to Cleveland. I desire to have that part of the bill read.

The second section of the bill was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. KNOTT. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. It may be all right, but I do not know anything about it.

The question being taken, there were ayes 99, noes not counted.

So the bill was ordered to be read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 906, a bill (H. R. No. 5127) to establish a western division of the southern judicial district of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides in its first section that that portion of the State of Mississippi comprising the counties of Tunica, Quitman, Coahoma, and Bolivar be taken from the northern and added to the southern judicial district of Mississippi, and that said counties, together with Washington, Sunflower, Yazoo, Sharkey, Issaquena, Warren, Claiborne, Jefferson, Adams, and Wilkinson, and all territory embraced therein, which may hereafter be erected into new counties, shall hereafter constitute the western division of the southern judicial district of Mississippi.

The remaining sections of the bill provide the arrangements requisite for carrying out this enactment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALCASIEN LOG SEIZURE.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the same committee, reported a substitute for the resolution referred to that committee April 27, 1878.

The substitute was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a select committee of three members who shall employ a clerk, stenographer, and deputy sergeant-at-arms, and proceed to the State of Louisiana at such time as said committee shall determine, with full power to sit during the recess, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony. It shall be the duty of said committee to investigate, as far as they may deem necessary, the charges of corruption and malfeasance in office preferred against M. A. Carter, special agent of the Interior Department, and the parties connected with the Calcasien log seizures.

Mr. CONGER. Is that the report of the committee?

The SPEAKER. It is the resolution recommended by the committee as a substitute for the original House resolution referred to them.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the report be read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. What is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By consent of the House, after the morning hour to-day the previous question was to be considered as ordered on the bill in relation to the life-saving service. That is the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. To the exclusion of all other orders?

The SPEAKER. This is by unanimous consent, which is equivalent to a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WOOD. Is it not competent for the House to reverse that order at this time?

Mr. ROBERTS. The previous question is already ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered by the terms of the resolution itself.

Mr. WOOD. I shall not object if it be understood that at the expiration of this hour we shall go into Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill.

Mr. REAGAN. No, no.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot consent to any such understanding.

Mr. ROBERTS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it competent to move now that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBERTS. I demand the regular order. I yield the time to which I am entitled after the ordering of the previous question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] yields to me to make a request of the House under instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary; which is, that there be an evening session next Monday at half past seven o'clock for the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary. There are a large number of reports ready to be made by that committee, which it is impossible to get in during the morning hour.

Mr. WOOD. I desire, with all due respect to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to say that the Committee of Ways and Means have very many reports to make which the Treasury Department deem it important should be made before Congress adjourns, and we have no opportunity to make any reports under the ruling of the Speaker in reference to our rights.

The SPEAKER. To what ruling of the Chair does the gentleman from New York refer?

Mr. WOOD. I refer to the decision of the Chair which puts the Committee of Ways and Means, in making reports upon revenue affairs, upon the same footing with other committees, and which practically excludes them from an opportunity of presenting their reports, unless they take the usual course by reporting them under the rules for committal or for commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I think that either the rules should be amended so that some opportunity shall be given to the Revenue Committee to report and ask the action of the House on measures which are indispensable before Congress shall adjourn, or else, if any time should be set aside for the special consideration of reports from committees, the Committee of Ways and Means should have a prior right.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to say that the Committee on the Judiciary have designated Monday evening so as not to conflict with the Committee of Ways and Means or any other committee, as it is a time which gentlemen generally in this House prefer not to occupy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] asks unanimous consent of the House that next Monday evening at seven thirty o'clock shall be assigned for reports from the Committee on the Judiciary for business.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that the gentleman modify his resolution so as to include general appropriation bills, so that if the House shall not be through with the appropriation bills we may have an opportunity to give the business of the Committee on Appropriations preference.

Mr. CONGER. But for next Monday the Committee on Appropriations have the whole time; they have all time, and why should they ask for an evening session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that they are asking it.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky if he modifies it in the way I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations are not making any such request.

Mr. BURCHARD. Well, the House is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT?] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG. I should like to have my inquiry answered before the regular order is called up. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. It is the regular order to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to know if it is in order now to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, because the House has bound itself to proceed to the bill in relation to the life-saving service.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I take the floor, Mr. Speaker, by the indulgence of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] for the purpose of making a remark or two on the pending bill, the importance of which I do not underrate, the life-saving service, which involves the lives of numbers of our own citizens as well as those of other countries, the fortunes of our own citizens and the fortunes of citizens of other countries. That it needs reformation, that it needs reorganization, I freely admit, and to show that fact, Mr. Speaker, and I make these remarks for the benefit of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] I refer to the report of the superintendant of this service, made in 1877. It had grown or has now grown under the influences that control it into a large service, but it has ceased to perform the high offices that was expected of it, because it has been more or less under the influence and control of politicians and of local influence.

I had hoped, if I had time enough to examine into this bill in its details, to propose that naval officers should have been detailed for this service, that it could be better brought under the organization and under better discipline than has heretofore existed. I do not underrate the importance of this subject and I therefore see the necessity of its reorganization, and I for one, having had my attention drawn in that direction, had trusted that it would have been so placed in its management, in order that this service might be benefited by the discipline and organization that would follow under the control of men who are educated in this thought, so to speak, and place it under military organization.

In the bill I had the honor to introduce, touching on this subject, there was no intention in its terms to justify the charge that it is a measure that makes war upon this service. There is a class of men on this floor who charge that the bill I introduced makes war on this service, more or less; and in answer to such charges I will state that no war is intended, but the purpose really was to make the service more efficient, by a thorough discipline and a thorough organization of this large body of men. I have found, in looking at the public service, that we have a large number of men educated at the public expense who are educated in that line of thought who might readily take charge of the whole subject. Here you have the light-house service and the Coast-Survey service under the control of men educated in the Naval Academy. Why not place this life-saving service under the same control? I repeat that you have educated these men in a line of thought who could readily grasp this service and make it more useful and more efficient, and that is the idea of my bill. But recognizing, Mr. Speaker, the practical decision of the House on the reference of the bill I had the honor to introduce, the majority of the House was committed to the bill of my friend from New York. I have to say in that regard that beyond these remarks I shall not on the present occasion make further opposition to his bill, trusting that he and the House will give the subject more vital attention, care, and thought before the matter is disposed of, and join with me in bringing this service under that thorough organization and discipline which I know his educated mind will recognize as a necessity. Whether this service should be in the Navy or out of it I will leave it to the future to develop.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, that I should detain the House on the question of the transfer of the life-saving service to the Navy Department, for the purpose of carrying this bill. This bill is opposed to that transfer. The House is against it. If in the future we can improve the service, I shall be happy to join with my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] and receive from him the advantage of his acquaintance with the naval service. This bill is intended to improve the life-saving service, not to transfer it to any other Department of the Government. It provides for adding stations to the number already in existence, for increasing the number on the North Carolina coast, on the lakes, on the Gulf, and on the Pacific coast. It fixes the time of service to begin earlier in the year. In various ways, to which I will presently allude, it seeks to give not only order but strength to the system.

Mr. Speaker, the necessities of our condition on this star make the seas highways to man. Prompted as well by curiosity and adventure as by a desire to trade and live, man has ever braved the ocean. It has its wonders and utilities, and human skill and courage have not been wanting to reveal them. From the frailest craft of the isles of the southern seas to the grand steamers that breast the Northern Atlantic; from the rude sailors of antiquity, who steered by the stars, to those who use the compass, the quadrant, the dead-reckoning and the signal lights; from the time when our largest oceans were a waste known to but few, or when its supremacy was disputed by Carthage and Rome, to this later era when Maury has traced the streams themselves amid the seas for the benefit of commerce, and the goblin of steam has shortened voyages and matched the storm king—it has been a part of the science of our advancement to watch with unwinking espionage the phenomena of the waters that cover the face of the earth.

COMMERCE TRIUMPHANT.

For thousands of years ships have glided through liquid leagues, from horizon to horizon, harmed and unharmed, under sun and star. They have brought to us the wonders of the deep for poetry, art, science, and civilization. From Salamis to Trafalgar human passion has imitated the angry elements in war, and ensanguined the deep with the blood of nations, and every muse has chanted its heroes of the sea. Beneath the blue of the Mediterranean repose the bones of past greatness, whose relics are epics like an Odyssey, forever sung in the memories of men to the "swelling of the voiceful sea." It has been reserved to another art to transcribe for the eye these memories. Vernet, Van Beest, Vandevelde, Bradford, and a galaxy of artists have pictured every mood of the ocean, from the drifting, drifting of the endless main, or the auroral radiance rising above the billows to gild the world, to the wild tumult of the cyclone, when the deep boileth and maketh a path to shine after it. These princes of the palette have given to the canvas—sun, shade, cloud, sky, shore, sail, craft, and water; sailor, boat, wreck, and storm, in all their beauty, vigor, truth, and wildness, and in every form and color to gratify art and glorify nature. Science has dived below the surface to analyze the foundations of the earth, and lay the measures thereof, to confound our human surmises and propitiate our fears.

To the superficial eye even the ocean is unparalleled as an exhibition of force and sublimity; but when mechanism measures its depth it becomes, in comparison with the solid earth, "but as the sweat of the wrestler's brow compared to his knitted body." Byron called it "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue;" but it was La Place who ascertained its depth before the plummet had sounded it or observation had obtained it for the Atlantic cable. The science of man has penetrated its deepest zones, down among the oölites of the northern sea and the coral reefs of the southern, and multiplied to infinity the wonders of that day when the sea shall give up its countless dead.

OCEAN DANGERS.

Strange as it may seem, one of the weird attractions of the ocean is its danger. Property and life beyond human estimate have been swallowed up by its capacious, all-devouring hunger. Civilized nations, especially those which are maritime, have levied taxes and concerted plans to lessen these dreadful dangers. Our light-houses, coast-surveys, buoys, signals, life-boats and mortars—like quarantine, and rods against the thunderbolt—these are but a small portion of the precautions which have been taken to rescue property from its insatiate clutch and welcome the mariner with joyful beacon from headlands, before he furls his sail for home.

ENGLISH HUMANITY ON THE DEEP.

Humanity, more beautiful than art and more profound than science, has bent over the tempestuous seas her grand ethereal bow, unfolding its hues of promise as an everlasting covenant with Heaven!

England, being especially the maritime power, has been foremost in laws and instruments for this purpose. I hold in my hand a wreck-chart of the British Isles. See how their coasts are dotted! The black marks indicate the foundering, stranding, dismasting, leaking, and colliding of ships. The surrounding seas seem black with these numberless maritime woes. But interspersed with these black dots observe these red ones. They represent life-boats and their stations. This map is the epitome of English progress in commerce. It is the sign of her strength. It is her prismatic arc of humanity on the deep.

England has been called a fortress and the channel the moat girdling and guarding it, but the latter is rather a highway of all the nations. Every year nearly a million of ships with over ten millions of souls come and go out of her ports.

The number of persons employed as crew for each vessel averaging from 11.9 to 12.8 per vessel.

The number of passengers arriving in the United States from all foreign countries during the same period was 206,503 and the number reported as departing from the United States for foreign countries 136,549. The average number of passengers arriving per annum during the last ten years was 370,425 and the average number departing was 98,321.

They are subject to exacting gales, dangerous sands, and sunken rocks—altars on which the ocean offers its countless victims. These losses have been increased as well by the fickleness and fury of the elements as by the selfishness and carelessness of men. The overladen, badly built, and rotten ships are not among the least of the perils of the English seaman. Happily, reforms as to this have been recently ordered by Parliament, but it was done under the startling cry of "murder" which rang through the House of Commons and for which the courageous Plimsoll was censured.

The fearful list of losses upon the coasts of England and America, not to speak now of other nations, warns us of the limitation of human ingenuity and power. Wreck and death cannot be altogether averted. There are misfortunes, as there are diseases, beyond cure or medicine. Neither wood nor iron, however artistically imbound to frame the ships, can withstand the forces of stormful nature. They are as straws before the wild wind. We guard life on land by law, but at sea a breath of Heaven dashes it to ruin.

It is not in our power, Mr. Speaker, to prevent the causes of wreck or rise above all disaster, but it is no less our highest duty to confine disaster and death on sea as on land within the narrowest limits possible.

THE ENGLISH SYSTEM.

The English National Life-Boat Association has saved, within fifty years since its establishment, some twenty-five thousand lives and fabulous values in property. Its coadjutors, the coast-guard and rocket-saving bureau under the government board of trade have increased these benefactions. This has been done almost entirely by voluntary contributions. Two millions of dollars have been spent in these efforts.

The English system is not very old. It is no older than I am; it was born the same year. But it has a harvest of humanity garnered by the endurance, pluck, and goodness of its men. It has voted thanks and honors, inscribed on vellum, for those who cared not for medals or money. In money it has given $20,000 per year in gratuities to the rescuers of life. Since its organization it has spent, up to 1876, $1,940,000, and given ninety-two gold medals and eight hundred and seventy-one silver medals. The lists are published annually. Besides, it has during that time spent yearly $200,000 for boats and apparatus, being the amount of its receipts from its invested bonds and donations.

Upon its medals is the picture of the royal patroness, the Queen, and the biblical motto "Let not the deep swallow me," being the exclamation of a shipwrecked man as he is drawn into a life-boat by adventurous life-savers. These deeds, more golden than ever historic pen recorded, are all done around the little sea-bound coast of Britain. Who shall complain that we spend the same sum per annum upon our ten thousand miles of sea and lake coast? What vicissitudes of weather meets our American mariner—from the tropical tornado to the tempestuous nor'easter; from the jagged fiords of Maine to the hidden shoals, rips, and ledges of Massachusetts and Rhode Island; from the menacing arm of Cape Cod to the insidious sand-beaches, treacherous undercurrents, and exposed headlands and points—six hundred miles southward to where Hatteras and Fear extend their dangers into the very main itself. Nor are these points of our vast coast the only ones prolific in ghastly disasters. My bill now pending proposes to rescue life upon the capricious gulf, the stormy lakes, and even upon the falsely named Pacific shore. Wherever our adventurous commerce goes, wherever Neptune disports with the elements to whelm the forces and agencies of man to master them, there men of our manliest mold will be found to combat him.

But, with all human precautions, how many are the disasters. Although in England but 1 per cent. of the vessels is lost, and although our losses are less, yet the record is not what it should be.

AMERICAN LOSSES LESS THAN BRITISH.

For reasons not necessary now to elaborate, connected with the models, proportions, size, and lading of vessels, the percentage of total loss in the American mercantile fleet is, to our credit, only about one-half that of the British marine. Strength and buoyancy to carry safely upon the sea are indispensable conditions to human security and profitable trade. The time is not far distant, I trust, for the old renown of our American shipping under liberal policies. But so far as the question of life-saving is concerned it has no nationality. Death knows no citizen, no foreigner, no friend, no enemy; for are we not all blended in one immortal destiny? Life-saving is the friend of the human race. A large proportion of the vessels wrecked upon our own shores, as well as upon the English coast, perhaps one-third, are under alien flags.

Nor is the question of life-saving local in its character. There are localities, like Hatteras or Squam Beach, where there are peculiar perils. But the locality of the rescuer and rescued does not indicate where the main interest lies. It concerns insurers as well as shipowners, wherever they live; Liverpool as well as Boston; Havre as well as Galveston; Glasgow as well as New York. It concerns commerce in its largest sense, and human life everywhere with all its sanctity.

PESTILENCE BAD, AND SHIPWRECK WORSE.

When my friend from Georgia, [Mr. FELTON,] in debating the quarantine subject, advised the House that his Committee on Commerce had favorably considered my bill, he gracefully wedded it to this service. He made an appeal to our better nature. He referred to my intense interest in this humane object, and invoked my aid in behalf of the bill which he championed. There is a common interest in the prevention of those pestilences and disasters which attend commerce. While doubting as to how far his compliment should extend in its personal application to myself, I was touched in my heart by the eloquent appeal which he made, and to which the House so generously responded. Would that I had his earnest words and manner that I might now plead for commerce and for averting its terrible casualties.

There is no doubt that ocean travel should be supervised to secure good sanitary conditions. There cannot be too much vigilance in such supervision, as it is a well-recognized fact that the morbific causes of infection elude even the most thorough prevision. Congress has done what it could in that direction; but the waste of human life among the toilers and travelers of the sea is not largely due to infection. The science of medicine, as was well shown by my friend from Georgia, has vigorously prosecuted, nationally and internationally, the warfare upon diseases to their endemic homes. But next after war, shipwreck shows the largest record of mortality. In 1875 fifteen hundred and eighty-seven vessels suffered disaster on our shores, and $10,000,000 would not pay the loss in property. Over twenty thousand lives were imperiled, besides eight hundred and eighty-eight lives lost. In the year 1873-'74 over six thousand vessels suffered wreck, collision, or other casualty, as reported to the British board of trade, resulting in a total loss of fourteen hundred and eleven vessels and sixty-eight hundred and seventeen lives.

During ten years ending June 30, 1874, there were 22,098 wrecks near the British coasts alone. Ninety millions of property were lost and eighty two hundred lives. Three-fifths of these losses were occasioned by defects in ships and equipments, overlading, carelessness, and collisions. In the United States during the same period the proportion was less. Not to weary the House with statistics, let me say that Great Britain and its colonies, and the commercial countries of Europe, together with the United States, have over one hundred and fifty thousand vessels, with a tonnage of nearly twenty million tons, manned by a million and a half of seamen. The part which our Government has taken in giving safety to our portion of this great commerce is nobly represented by light-vessels, floating-signals, revolving beacons, buoys, tenders, signal service, coast survey, marine hospitals, steamboat inspectors, and life-saving service.

MORE LEGISLATION NECESSARY.

Much as we have done to protect human life from the diseases and disasters of commerce, there is a great necessity for more efficient measures. So far as steam-vessels are concerned, the inspection law is ample if enforced; but as to other vessels, which do the bulk of our commercial work, I have the authority of Dr. Woodworth, supervising surgeon-general United States marine-hospital service, for saying that absolutely nothing is done by the Government to eliminate the unseaworthy craft, to prevent overloading, or the sending them to sea with short or unseaworthy crews.

HISTORY OF OUR LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

It is not my purpose to go into the history of the organization and development of this life-saving service. It is of comparatively recent origin. It dates only from 1848, since which time up to 1872 four thousand lives have been saved. It was limited for twenty years to the Jersey and Long Island coasts. It had small appropriations, a few shanties, no discipline, and very indifferent apparatus. In 1872 a new era was inaugurated. Discipline was evoked out of chaos by the employment of regular crews and a patrol system. The line which is attached to the ball and shot from a rocket or mortar and thrown over the disabled vessel then came into more frequent use. Since then the car fastened upon the rope extending from the vessel to the shore has been the vehicle of safety to thousands of lives. The first use of this car resulted in the saving of over two hundred lives on the Jersey coast.

Since 1872, as will be seen in detail hereafter, nearly five thousand lives have been saved and not less than seven millions of property. During the year ending June 30, 1877, one hundred and thirty-four vessels were driven ashore within the scope of the operations of this service. Of the fifteen hundred persons on board only thirty-nine were lost, or about 2½ per cent. Of the cargo and vessels, estimated at $3,266,612, more than half was saved. Since 1872, and especially since the losses during the past year of the Huron and Metropolis, there has been much discussion among practical and humane men with reference to rendering this service more efficient.

NEW PROJECTS.

Various projects have been suggested, from the improved life-boat and rubber raft to the improved mortar, which can throw its shot and line twice the old distance; but the great desideratum for the efficiency of the service, as will appear by the report of the Committee on Commerce and in the course of the discussion, is the provision of the committee's bill for closer stations and service earlier in the season. The cost of this service last year was $203,000. This bill will double the appropriation.

It is my purpose to show that no better appropriation of the same amount of money can be made. We have now over one hundred and fifty houses belonging to the service. These are divided into life-saving stations, simple life-boat stations, and houses of refuge. Evidently larger salaries must be given to insure the constant and arduous work and drill and the watchfulness and responsibility indispensable through all weathers for a service so humane and perilous. Doubtless time will develop improvements in life-boats more suitable to our coasts, better training of those who are to combat the dangers of the surf, and better signals from the shore to the crew of the wrecked vessel. We shall soon have the uses of the telephone and aërophone for instantaneous and stentorian communication, distancing time and superior to the thunder of surf and storm, between the stations and between these and the ship.

PRESENT AND PROPOSED ORGANIZATION.

The organization at present comprises eleven districts. It is proposed to increase the number of these as well as of the stations. New uses are found for the service upon the Texas and lake coasts and provided for in the bill. The main business of the new bill, however, is to erect the system into a distinct establishment. This the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended. It is to be under a recognized and responsible administrator. The bill provides for this, and in careful detail indicates what are his special functions. The other details will be discussed, when objection shall be made, seriatim.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

I have received a great number of letters from practical men acquainted with the service, containing criticisms and suggestions, many of which have been heeded and utilized, especially those connected with the investigation into the causes of loss of life by shipwreck and the employment of men fitted by experience as surfmen for the duty of life-saving. The experience of the last season, and especially in connection with the loss of the Metropolis and the Huron, has called out the inventive and utilitarian ideas of our coastmen. Many of these suggestions belong not so much to the making of the law as to its execution. But, in this as in other matters, the old adage has been realized, that even from the worst of tempests some good has ensued.

INEFFICIENCY AND PARTISANSHIP OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

If accusation is brought against the life-saving service on account of the control gained by petty politicians in the fifth and sixth districts, as set forth in the annual report for 1877, and the consequent filling of the stations with incompetent keepers and crews, it can be answered—

That this abuse only occurred to be radically corrected, at once and forever.

It is true that in these districts, when newly organized, the stations were filled for a few days with many incompetents. But directly after their enlistment boards of examiners, composed of revenue-marine and marine-hospital officers, were dispatched to scrutinize the character of the personnel. The consequence was an immediate weeding out of improper employés and the securing of suitable persons in their places.

Thus the last report of examination in the fifth district shows that of the eight keepers examined only one was found below the requisite standard. This was on the score of health. Of the fifty-one surfmen only three were found unsuitable, and dismissed. In district No. 6 only one keeper out of the whole number in the district was reported for removal. He was not professionally incompetent, but lacked executive force. Of the sixty-one surfmen examined only one was thought unfitted and discharged. Incompetent persons may get into the stations as keepers and surfmen, but the examining boards prevent them from staying there.

REGULATIONS, NOT LEGISLATION, AS TO DETAILS.

The bill cannot provide for all emergencies. Much must be left to its efficient execution. The complaints as to partisan preferences in certain localities can only be obviated by honest discharge of duty. The regulations provide for medical and other inspection, and the great body of the details, such as the mode of drill, kind of boats and lanterns, the use of telephone or telegraph, of horses, wagons, uniforms, life-preservers, buoyant rafts and breeches, buoys and rubber suits like Boyton's, and even dumb stations, as recommended in a letter to me from Captain Ollinger, as well as the selection of the men, cannot be the subject of legislation. They belong to the "regulations," and are under the control of the supervising agencies.

These the Secretary of the Treasury is already empowered by law to make. They are here in the volume before me. The life-boat stations, the life-saving stations, and houses of refuge each have a distinct utility. In the appointment of superintendent, inspector, and assistants, much care must be exercised, but the keepers and surfmen must undergo suitable examinations. They must be familiar with their locality and work. The duties of these officers are specially delineated by the regulations. Rules are given for the care of the apparatus. The first duty, before goods or property, is the preservation of life. Cargoes must have care, especially if dutiable. The resuscitation of those seemingly drowned is impressed with clear instructions. Patrolmen with their lights are organized, and in their duty they are held to a strict account. Guards against fraud and embezzlement of goods are imperative; and every precaution possible is to be used to identify and provide for the dead and the surviving. The rules are illustrated here on page 45, which show how the line from the rocket mortar should be faked on the ground; how it is to be shot, how secured, how the rope and block are made fast to the mast, and how the hawser and the cylindrical iron car with its freight of six is hauled ashore. Not less rigorous is the direction for the self-bailing and self-righting life-boat. Those who saw the apparatus at the Centennial require no further elucidation of its use. Much depends upon the experience of the surfmen. They must dodge the seas or beach the boat, and much more depends on the character of the broken water and the shoring. Detailed instructions are given as to the rescue of the drowning, and the swimming against the outgoing tide or current. Signal flags, lights, and guns have their interesting chapter; and in all these matters drill is insisted upon with imperative command.

HURON AND METROPOLIS DISASTERS.

The life-saving service is charged with inefficiency on account of the wrecks of the Huron and Metropolis. The answer to this charge is ample; and in the answer lies the argument for this bill.

The life-saving stations on the North Carolina coast were not open for service at the time of the wreck of the Huron, (November 24,) because the appropriations for the pay of surfmen would not admit of manning them until the 1st of December. The amount appropriated for the current year for the pay of surfmen was $146,000. The length of time during which surfmen are employed with this sum upon different portions of the coast is determined by latitude and by statistics. These show the comparative frequency of wrecks at different points. The following is a statement of the expenditures under this head for the current year:

Employment of surfmen, season of 1877–'78.

District.	Number of stations.	Number of surfmen.	When open.	Expenditures.
District No. 1	6	36	November 1 to May 1	$8,640
District No. 2	4	24	November 1 to May 1	5,760
District No. 2	10	60	November 1 to April 15	13,200
District No. 3	7	42	November 15 to April 15	8,400
District No. 3	27	162	November 15 to April 1	29,160
District No. 4	6	36	November 15 to April 15	7,200
District No. 4	32	192	November 15 to April 1	34,560
District No. 5	8	48	December 1 to April 1	7,680
District No. 6	10	60	December 1 to April 1	9,600
District No. 8	3	18	September 1 to December 15	2,520
District No. 8	3	18	April 1 to June 1	1,440
District No. 9	4	24	July 1 to November 24	4,608
District No. 9	5	32	September 1 to December 15	4,480
District No. 9	4	24	May 15 to July 1	1,440
District No. 9	5	32	April 1 to June 1	2,560
District No. 10	3	18	September 1 to December 15	2,520
District No. 10	3	18	April 1 to June 1	1,440
				145,208

This leaves $792 only with which to pay the surfmen for the remainder of the fiscal year. This small remaining sum, which is yet to be reduced, is to be employed at some of the new stations on the Pacific coast and those upon the Atlantic coast where it may be found necessary to employ certain surfmen after the season. Such continuance of the employment of crews at some of the stations will be necessary, as is the case every year.

If the life-saving station in the vicinity (Nag's Head, No. 7) had been open, the testimony of the survivors of the Huron is that the crew of the vessel would probably all have been saved. We must look to other causes, to wit, bad seamanship, for the loss of the Huron. I assert that there was a lack of practical seamanship. We do not get it at Annapolis. Less dancing and more study of engines, currents, and tides would be advantageous to our naval service and prevent such deplorable results.

The Metropolis was lost on the Currituck shore, twenty-five miles from the Huron disaster. The heart sickens with the list of the poor men thus lost on their voyage to a distant land to better their condition. Who can picture the agony of suspense and terror when wind and wave combined their vengeful power? But it must be remembered that at the wreck of the Metropolis many lives were saved by the life-saving men. Their failure to save probably all, is due, first, to the paucity of stations on the North Carolina coast and the distance of the wreck from a station, and, secondly, to the bad management by those on board the vessel of the line thrown them by the life-saving crew, which allowed it to be chafed in two by the wire rigging. The captain and other survivors testify that had the life-saving crew reached the vessel in the forenoon probably all would have been saved. The official report of Captain Merryman, who investigated the matter, shows that it was impossible for the station men to reach the scene of the wreck any sooner than they did. It also shows the manner in which the line was broken.

It was by no fault of those who shot the line. The line was sawed in two by chafing across an iron-wire stay. It should have been dropped to starboard by the man aloft who seized it. It was the best kind of line in use, and suitable for the purpose beyond all others. A hundred were rescued and cared for. See pages 4 and 5 of Captain Merryman's report.

The difficulty of reaching the scene of this appalling disaster is well described in the same report, from which I quote:

> In order to appreciate the difficulty which the six men encountered in hauling the mortar-cart and load, it must be remembered that station 4 is situated on a portion of the coast so flat for nearly a mile inland and so slightly above ordinary high water that the storm-tides sweep over it and, surrounding the station, cover the sandy plain to a depth of several inches, and this had occurred the night before, making the sand so soft and yielding that the wheels of the cart, with their broad tires, five inches wide, cut four or five inches below the surface, while the feet of the men, as they labored with their load, sank in the sand at every step; consequently the party could make but slow progress. The cart contained the mortar, three balls, the whip-line and block, the breeches-buoy, a tackle, powder-flask, quick-matches, match-rope, and line-stock, line-box, and a Merriman life-saving suit, which, with the cart, made a dead weight of more than one thousand pounds, one hundred and sixty-six pounds to each man. (Standard authorities give the draught of man at one hundred and fifty pounds over a firm, level road, and say that a porter can transport in a wheelbarrow one hundred and fifty pounds ten miles a day.) These men were not fresh, as within the preceding twenty-four hours one of them had walked thirty-two miles through the storm on the north patrol, another twenty-four miles on the south, while two others had walked sixteen miles each, and the remaining two twelve miles each. Frequent halts were therefore imperative. The wonder is that they got the apparatus to the wreck so soon as they did. It could not have been done had they not been overtaken about a mile and a half from the station by Mr. John J. Dunton with his horse and cart. He states: "They (the crew) were worn down, it being a bad beach for men to travel, and asked me for assistance. I hitched on to the cart, and was glad to do so. We arrived at the wreck about twelve o'clock."
> The mortar was immediately got into operation. The statements vary somewhat as to the number and order of the shots fired, which is not remarkable, as on such occasions exciting events so quickly follow each other that comparatively cool and collected men fail to recall them in their exact sequence.

Captain Merryman concludes his statement with the recommendations which the committee's bill carries out:

> The proposed additional stations, with an increase of two surfmen to each, will, in my opinion, amply provide for the needs of the coast, and make the service there as efficient in its operations as in the older districts on Long Island and New Jersey, by reducing the length of the patrols, enabling earlier discovery of wrecks, prompter arrival of boats and apparatus at the same, and the early assemblage of the crews of adjacent stations when signaled for aid. The two additional men will materially relieve the labors of the patrol, besides affording an extra man to care for the station while the crew is engaged at a wreck, and another to remain on the beach to aid the boat in landing and for other useful duties.

Besides, it is generally agreed and amply proved that the Metropolis was unseaworthy. She went to pieces sooner in consequence of her rotteness. She was sixteen years old, and had been coddled for the occasion; but this matter is being examined by the committee.

It does not, however, lessen but increases the need of more care on shore since such vessels are allowed afloat. Reform should be radical to reach such disasters.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to the Senate resolution of February 6, introduced by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] which letter was referred to the Committee on Commerce February 19, (Ex. Doc. No. 31,) shows specifically the condition of the service on the North Carolina coast. It will enable members to perceive the cause of the failure to render all the desired aid at the wreck of the Metropolis. That it was not done is the result of the very defects which the officers in charge of the service have repeatedly pointed out. Again and again have they prayed to have these defects remedied. So far from affording ground for declaring the management of the service inefficient, this only proves the wisdom and forethought of the recommendations of those officers. In the annual report of the life-saving service for 1876 the general superintendent says:

> The portion of the coast embraced between Capes Henry and Hatteras does not appear to be sufficiently provided with stations. The distance between the stations now located thereon averages ten miles, which is too great to admit of their complete surveillance by the patrol. * * * The number and serious character of the disasters which have since occurred thereon clearly indicate the need of an additional number.

The report for the succeding year, 1877, has the following:

> The experience of the last few years has plainly shown the need of additional stations upon the coasts of Virginia and North Carolina.
>
> On the coasts named there are now but ten stations, the distance between which averages ten miles, which is far too great to admit of the thorough application of the prime feature of the service, the patrol system. On other portions of the Atlantic coast which admit of the patrol the stations are from three to four miles apart, a distance fully great enough to admit of the enforcement of the regulation in the fierce storms of winter with safety to the patrolmen. The distance is also so great as to materially impair the chances of reaching in time to effect rescues, the shipwrecks which may occur midway between the stations. It is therefore recommended that authority be given for establishing additional stations on this coast at intermediate points between those existing. Five others should also be located between the southernmost station and Cape Fear.

OTHER RESCUES IN THE HURON AND METROPOLIS STORMS.

Where the protection of the service is ample, such failures do not occur. In the same storm that wrecked the Huron the life-saving crews rescued eighteen persons, men and women, from the Russian bark Johanna Lang, on the New Jersey coast, and the crew of the schooner Maggie, on the Long Island coast; and in the storm which wrecked the Metropolis the crews of two vessels which were driven upon the New Jersey coast were taken ashore by the life-saving men. These were all the wrecks which occurred upon the coast in those storms. The columns of the New York papers of the 23d of February show what splendid work the life-saving crews did in the storm of Thursday night, the 21st of February.

In no instance within the past six years can failure to rescue imperiled seamen on stranded vessels be successfully attributed to the inefficiency of the life-saving service. If any instance be cited as such I assert that proof to the contrary can be produced.

SUFFICIENCY OF FUNDS AND EFFICIENCY OF SERVICE.

The general answer to attacks on this point is, where there is sufficiency there is efficiency. On all other parts of the coast than North Carolina the life-saving service has been a complete success. For years the public journals of the country, stimulated by the exploits of the crews of such wrecks as those of the Rusland, the Amerique, &c., have sounded its praises. Last year every illustrated newspaper in the country pictured the splendid work of these crews and could not say too much in their honor. The following is the record of the service for the last six years, giving a of wrecks which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations from November 1, 1871, (date of reorganization,) to close of fiscal year ending June 30, 1877:

GENERAL SUMMARY OF THE SERVICE,

Total number of disasters	407
Total value of vessels	$6,921,394
Total value of cargoes	$4,212,012
Total value of property saved	$6,967,947
Total value of property lost	$4,129,459
Total number of persons on vessels	4,730
Total number of persons saved	4,650
Total number of lives lost	80
Total number of persons sheltered	959
Total number of days' shelter afforded	2,867

The foregoing table shows that within six years, out of forty-seven hundred and thirty persons exposed upon four hundred and seven wrecks only eighty lives have been lost. This is a proud record. It has never been surpassed by any similar service in the world. I affirm this after a study of the systems of all countries.

SHALL THE NAVY HAVE IT?

But it is said that "a practical man" should be placed in charge of the life-saving service? By this is meant, a Navy man, or a seaman, one who may know Bowditch better than the Gulf Stream, and Norie better than steam-engines.

The answer is that success is the criterion of administrative ability. We point to the extraordinary and admitted success of the life-saving service, on every coast where its system has been fairly tried. North Carolina is not to the purpose. Why not charge inefficiency because of disaster between Hatteras and Cape Fear, where there are no stations, as on the other parts of the North Carolina coast where there are too few? Is a seaman for the head of an aquatic establishment necessary or preferable? Is not the Secretary of the Navy a civilian? Are not the heads of the life-saving institutions in Great Britain, from whence came the life-boat and the grand traditions of skill and prowess in life-saving, civilians?

The officer in charge of our life-saving service has the assistance of "practical" men in the inspectors and assistant inspectors of the service, who are officers of the revenue marine, and are skilled coast navigators such as the Navy cannot show. He has local superintendents who are old seamen and surfmen; and in the officers of the Ordnance Corps, whose services have always been available in relation to experiments in gunnery, with a view to getting shot-lines to vessels.

Sophistry may be expected on the subject of placing the life-saving service in the able hands of naval officers who know the requirements of such a service, &c. The fact is that our naval officers are notoriously deficient in the very elements of the knowledge which is required to conduct the life-saving service. For example, a primary requisite is knowledge of the coast and coast navigation. The wreck of the Huron, which was a new and good vessel, is a signal instance in point. In this disaster the cabin might have learned from the forecastle, and it tells far more against the Navy than it ever could be made to do against the life-saving service. What sort of knowledge of the coast was shown by her being on that dangerous shore at such a time?

The revenue marine has frequently been employed in getting off Navy vessels. Ignorance of our coast or unskillfulness on the part of naval officers often causes them to get their ships aground. A number of our naval vessels have been lost within the last few years through this cause.

To transfer the life-saving service to the Navy is to take it abruptly from the hands of those who have spent upon it years of toil and study and gained experience and knowledge which only time can bestow. It is to place it in the hands of amateurs—men who have no knowledge whatever of its nature and requirements, except that gained by reading or cursory observation during some chance visit to a life-saving station. This, to say the least, is a hazardous experiment.

At first thought there might seem to be a propriety in placing the life-saving service in the Navy Department, both being aquatic; but here the analogy ends.

PROPRIETY OF THE TREASURY HAVING IT.

At first sight, also, it might seem improper to place it in the Treasury Department; but this appears otherwise when it is considered that to the Treasury belong all organizations relating to the aid and protection of commerce and the collection of the revenues. Are not the Coast Survey, Light-House Board, revenue marine, steamboat-inspection service, and life-saving service properly under the Treasury?

REVENUE MARINE.

The revenue marine, with which the life-saving service is connected, is a coast service. Its vessels are adapted and its officers are trained specially to coastwise navigation. This navigation involves special duties, proficiency in which can only be acquired by constant practice and long experience. Since 1837, when the President was authorized to cause public vessels to cruise upon the coast in the severe season of the year for the relief of distressed navigators, with the exception of a brief period during which the Navy undertook the work and abandoned it as impracticable for them, the vessels of the revenue marine alone have been annually designated for this service. The report of the life-saving service for 1876, on page 40, shows that between 1860 and 1876 twenty-three hundred and eighty-six distressed vessels have been assisted by them and four hundred and seventy-four lives saved. So well do they perform this service that every year the Treasury Department receives numerous acknowledgments of their services from boards of underwriters, ship-owners, and commanders of vessels, as well as acknowledgments from foreign governments.

Many of the officers of the service possess testimonials and decorations bestowed upon them abroad in recognition of the aid they have given distressed vessels. Successive annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury call attention to the extent of the humane work rendered by the revenue marine. Secretary Bristow asserted in his report for the year 1875 that throughout one entire month the marine columns of the principal commercial newspapers every day contained accounts of such relief administered to suffering vessels. The intimate knowledge of the coast and familiarity with the methods of rendering assistance in shipwrecks, and in saving life, peculiarly fits this service for the supervision of the life-saving service. Naval officers, on the contrary, are not practically familiar with the coast, and the Navy is essentially a deep-sea service, being simply the national military marine, designed and trained for naval warfare.

QUESTION OF ECONOMY.

The naval proposition is not in the interest of economy. It proposes the abolishment of the offices of district superintendents and the substitution therefor of officers detailed from the Navy, to be designated as inspectors. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to cut up the coast into as many districts as he pleases. The number of districts cannot be less than they are now, being divided by natural boundaries; and without restriction by law there is great danger of their number being unduly increased in order to make places for the assignment of officers to shore duty, which are eagerly sought for, and of expenses being augmented accordingly. Should, however, the number remain the same as now, the expenses of the service would be considerably increased, inasmuch as the compensation of the naval officers referred to considerably exceeds that of the present superintendents, which aggregates but $12,000 per annum. In addition there would be required an outlay for office rent and fuel, and probably clerk hire, which under the present system is not incurred, the superintendents, living in their own houses, which they use for offices, and performing their own clerical labor. Much expense is also saved by the transportation and distribution of outfits and supplies to the life-saving stations by the revenue-cutters in their cruising, which obviously naval vessels could not be employed to do. There is now a rigid inspection of the service by revenue-marine officers, in addition to the oversight exercised by the superintendents, which is inexpensively performed in connection with and without detriment to their other duties, their transportation being mainly secured upon their own vessels in their regular cruising.

WHAT ARE PRACTICAL MEN?

The naval inspectors would not have that intimate local knowledge of the coast which is deemed essential, and which a superintendent is required to have throughout the line of his district and which has always formed an important topic in the examination of candidates for these positions. This knowledge involves many features that are not and cannot be shown by charts, and can only be learned by continued local residence upon and examination of the coast. The knowledge of the inhabitants which superintendents have acquired by long residence in their respective districts is an almost indispensable requisite, and enables them to make suitable selections of keepers and surfmen. This also would be beyond the power of the naval strangers until after a residence of two or three years at least, at the end of which time by naval rule they would be detached and other strangers detailed in their places.

The naval proposition provides for the manning of the stations by men enlisted in the Navy. These men must either be the wreckers and fishermen who now compose the life-saving crews or Navy sailors. The former cannot be enlisted under the terms of the bill, to be subjected to naval discipline and made liable to transfer in case of war or other emergency, as the bill provides, to the decks of the Navy. They are citizens, generally of repute and standing and men of families, commonly well off and sometimes wealthy. They are coast fishermen and cannot be obtained for service upon the conditions of seamen. As far as any advantage resulting from enlistment is concerned this is already practically secured, the best men being generally re-engaged for six or seven years in succession, as the station lists show. As for the Navy sailors, they are not surfmen and would be utterly inefficient upon occasions of wrecks, the two professions being as technically distinct as the trades of a blacksmith and carpenter, yet it is these latter that the bill proposes to supply all vacancies with. The other sections of the naval amendment re-enacts existing law, which has defects so grave, that unless remedied they will utterly destroy the life-boat service upon the lakes. These defects and others in the present organization of the service are radically cured by the bill of the committee.

WHO ARE THE "AMATEURS?"

The fact is, with reference to the life-saving service, that it is the naval men who are the "amateurs," and not the officers of the revenue marine. This was shown conclusively in the elegant and eloquent speech of my colleague, [Mr. COVERT.] He is intimate with the conformation and peculiarities of the coast he represents, and his constituents are skilled men in coast navigation. The men of the Navy from the very nature of their functions are blue-water sailors and cruisers in foreign waters. They cannot be life-savers but life-losers, for they lose their own in the breakers too often. Why should the old captains of the merchant marine and experienced surfmen who constitute the superintendents of the life-saving districts be considered amateurs, or the hardy fishermen along the coast, brought up in the surf from childhood, from whose number are drawn by the most rigorous selection our life-saving crews? Certainly the civilian who brought the service from merely nothing to something good enough for the Navy to try to steal; who for seven years has made the subject a special study and has had that number of years' practical experience in its development and management—more years than Annapolis and cruising require to make a complete naval officer—who has organized success as Carnot organized victory, and made the establishment an honor to the nation and secured for it a reputation throughout the world second to that of no similar institution, who, until the wreck of the Metropolis, conducted its affairs without even an accusation of culpability, and whose annual reports prove him an adept in all matters connected with the life-saving business—certainly even Navy impudence could not call him an "amateur."

The epithet of "amateurs" comes with sorry grace from the lips of naval officers, whose only knowledge of the service is derived from the reports and other publications yielded by the experience—the painfully acquired experience—of the very men they seek to supplant, or from the observation of some chance hour in which they strayed into a life-saving station. Gentlemen of the Navy need to be reminded that with all their assumed and boasted familiarity with the service they have never contributed to it an idea, nor a measure, nor an invention in this or in any other country.

The life-saving service, as such, exists and has existed for many ages in a highly organized form. In China its conduct is intrusted to such mere "amateurs" as the river and harbor boatmen. So far as the Occident and modern times are concerned, it originated in Great Britain. In its whole inception and development—from its early scattered and broken beginnings to the splendid climax of later years—the British life-saving service is the work of "amateur" humanity, "amateur" courage, and "amateur" genius. The Royal National Life-boat Institution was founded in 1825, mainly through the strenuous efforts of an "amateur" nobleman, Sir William Hillary, baronet, aided by two "amateur" English members of Parliament, Mr. Thomas Wilson and Mr. George Hibbert, and a number of other "amateurs," drawn from the nobility, clergy, gentry, and mercantile classes. The admiralty appears to be wholly without representation in this remarkable movement, which made an institution of the most heroic of all boats, the life-boat, and multiplied its succor to seafarers along the entire coast of the United Kingdom. The numerous local life-boat associations which in Great Britain either sprung into being or were fed from this organization were also the enterprise of "amateurs." They never, in a single instance, owed anything to the patronage of the navy.

Following the success of the Royal National Life-boat Institution, similar life-saving societies were organized by "amateurs" in France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Turkey, and other countries on the continent. The only European nation whose navy ever attempted to handle the life-saving service was one which presently dropped it with a public confession of inability. I allude to Russia. Up to 1869 the Russian navy department had established a few life-saving stations, and was the first to recommend to the Emperor the plan now adopted of confiding to a private society, in imitation of the British system, the life-saving service of that country. Thus, the only nation in the world whose navy had a hand in the establishment of the life-saving service was also the one which made haste to resign it to the charge of "amateurs."

Not only in respect to the organization, but at every point, the life-saving service is the work of "amateurs." The seed-cone of the whole institution—the famous English life-boat—was the invention of an "amateur," Lionel Lukin, a London coachmaker, who patented the device in 1785; the only part the navy had in the matter being to obstruct the adoption of the boat for many years.

Although the Prince of Wales—

Says Mr. Lewis in his History of the Life-boat—had been the liberal patron of Mr. Lukin, yet even his influence was not sufficient to bring the life-boat into notice, and Mr Lukin appealed in vain for encouragement to the first lord of the admiralty, to the deputy master of Trinity House, and to various admirals and captains of the navy.

The successive improvements in 1789 of Lukin's boat were also the work of "amateurs." William Wouldhave, a painter, devised the side air-chambers, which add to the boat's buoyancy, and Henry Greathead, a boat-builder, contributed the curved keel, which greatly increased its efficiency. Another "amateur," Rev. James Bremner, of Wells, Orkney, a clergyman, invented in 1800 the means of making the boat self-righting: water-tight casks in the head and stern and three hundredweight of iron in the keel. In 1828, another "amateur," George Palmer, esq., member of Parliament, of Nazing Park, Essex, invented a further development of the life-boat. Later, two other "amateurs," Messrs. Lamb & White, of Cowes, continued the work with improved life-boats. In 1850, an "amateur," James Beeching, boat-builder, of Great Yarmouth, devised the great prize life-boat of the Royal National Institution. In 1851, two "amateurs," private Welsh gentlemen, father and son, H. and H. T. Richardson, invented the famous Richardson tubular life-boat, two cylinders laid parallel, with pointed ends turned up and in, and a grated deck above and between, the first specimen of which does service now on the bars of Oporto, and a number of which are on duty in English harbors. Finally, in 1852, one more "amateur," James Peake, master shipwright, at Woolwich, brought forth the great life-boat, improved on Beeching's, self-righting and self-bailing, which, if capsized, comes up like a water-dog, shakes itself free of the brine, and swims buoyant on the crest of the surge, stable, capacious, and invulnerable.

In all the history of these wondrous boats, which have saved thousands of persons, not once does the hand of the Navy nor of any of its officers appear. They are all the work of "amateurs." The same is true of the famous surf-boat, which is best adapted to use on our Atlantic coast, for whose flat beaches and shoaling seas the English life-boat is, by its great weight and draught, unsuitable. The surf-boat is also the device of "amateurs," being primarily devised for fishers and wreckers, and our Navy does not possess to-day a single boat of a model suitable for surf landing.

The same story continues throughout the entire range of life-saving appliances. The life-boat carriage was first the improvisation of unknown wheelwrights, "amateurs." Two other "amateurs" in England, Colonel Colquhoun and Colonel Tulloh, of the royal arsenal, successively designed improved carriages for the life-boat, and the solitary instance where a naval officer has appeared in connection with life-saving apparatus is that of Captain Ward, of the royal navy, who designed the life-boat carriage in present use in England. All else belongs to the "amateurs." The invention of a shot carrying a line, whereby connection can be established from the shore with a stranded vessel, was devised in 1809 by Captain Manby of the English merchant service. The light used in Great Britain for illuminating the scene of a wreck was invented by Colonel Millward. The favorite rocket for conveying a line to a wrecked vessel is Colonel Boxer's, another "amateur." Mr. F. Dent, chronometer-maker, got up specially for life-boat service Dent's life-boat compass.

In this country the "amateurs" still bear the palm in life-saving matters, and the "skilled hands of naval officers" are only seen in the attempt to wrest the institution, with all its appliances complete, from those who had the wit to invent and improve it. Was it not an "amateur," Captain Douglass Ottinger, of the revenue marine, who invented the famous life-car, which at its first trial in 1850, at the wreck of the ship Ayrshire, on Squam Beach, New Jersey, saved two hundred and one persons, men, women, and children? Could they have been rescued by any other means? Has it not continued in use ever since with invariable success, and did not Congress vote the inventor $10,000 for his humane contrivance? I have before me an interesting letter from him, protesting against taking this service from its present relations. Captain John M. Richardson, the superintendent of the first life-saving district, has constructed a remarkable improvement, in weight, draught, and other respects, on the English life-boat, which is in use in our service. The best gun in the world for sending a shot-line, until the present year, was devised by an "amateur," Robert P. Parrott, esq., only second now to the improved gun devised by another "amateur," Lieutenant Lyle, of the Ordnance Corps. At every successive invention or improvement in the noble art of life-saving we see the head of an "amateur," and, except in the single exception noted, the Navy cap is not upon one in the entire gallery. The record gives the gentlemen of the Navy the poorest possible title to any assumption of control over such an establishment.

The reasons against employing officers of the Navy in the life-saving service in place of civilians or revenue-cutter officers may be thus summed up:

First. The life-saving stations were first built and equipped under the personal superintendence of revenue-cutter officers in 1848. They have been connected with the life-saving service ever since, and to their efforts is due its present efficiency, as acknowledged by all maritime countries interested.

Second. The revenue-cutter service is essentially a coast service.

Third. Navy officers were formerly detailed as revenue-cutter officers. But their distaste to receiving orders from collectors of customs and other civil officers became so apparent that the cutters were wholly severed from the Navy, except in time of war, during the administration of Andrew Jackson.

Fourth. The life-saving service is now important as a coast guard for the prevention of smuggling and the protection of the revenues in addition to its humane purposes and duties, and, like the revenue marine, is a civil service, and needs no greater military element than is required in a well-conducted police force.

Fifth. Nor is it probable that the keepers and surfmen will relish the introduction of any strict or severe military or naval supervision, which must follow if the superintendents of districts are to be superseded by Navy officers.

Sixth. Superintendents of districts from civil life are important intermediates between the people of the coast and the present inspectors, who are trained civil officers of the Government, under semi-military discipline, and nearer to the people than the Army or Navy.

Seventh. Navy officers are now employed in the Light-House Service, the Coast-Survey, and the National Observatory, in addition to the navy-yards and many other shore stations appertaining to the Navy proper.

Eighth. The experience gained by revenue-cutter officers in the establishment and management of the stations has given them a knowledge of the various apparatus and methods for saving life and the needs of the service, together with a personal acquaintance with the people of the coast which no Navy officer can pretend to have or even acquire without an equally long experience in the service.

Ninth. The proposed change will double the expenses of the service, since it is a well-known fact that line officers of the Navy who would be thus employed are not experienced in the economical expenditure of public moneys until they have served as heads of bureaus in the Navy Department or navy-yards, positions which they do not reach until they are too far advanced in years for the active service absolutely necessary in the inspection and management of the life-saving service.

Tenth. The substitution of Navy officers for the present superintendents of districts will further increase the expense of the service in office rents and clerk hire, for which there is now no allowance whatever. The present superintendents in their respective districts do not require offices or clerks, while the revenue officers who are acting as assistant inspectors have their quarters on board the small vessels cruising as cutters in the sounds and bays.

Eleventh. These vessels are also used for transporting materials and supplies to the stations, not only without extra expense to the Government, but actually saving hundreds of dollars for freights and transportation, which is always expensive on the coast when private parties are employed.

Twelfth. Officers of the revenue marine retain their powers and duties as customs officers while inspecting the life-saving stations along the coast, where their legitimate duties call them.

Thirteenth. The English navy, it is true, performs a small part in the life-boat and saving system; but it is (as Lewis in his history relates) a special training which our Navy does not get.

In conclusion, Navy invention or capacity in any application to life-saving service is a blank, and naval officers have the very poorest of titles to the assumption of the conduct of a coast protection like the life-saving service.

PRACTICAL TALK.

Among the many letters which have been received here remonstrating against removing this service to the Navy Department are those from men of experience along the coast. I have before me a letter addressed to a Senator from a constituent. In it he says, substantially:

Ever since vessels have sailed our waters they have suffered shipwreck upon our shores. Ever since these shores have been inhabited by civilized men the victims of marine disasters have been dragged from dissolving vessels and freezing waters by the people of the coast. This has often been done at the risk, and at times the loss, of their own lives. They were fed, clothed, and sent upon their way. Their rescuers neither asked nor received any compensation, and no reward save that which comes from having done their duty to suffering humanity, and "unto others as we would they should do unto us," or such testimonials as certain organizations sometimes bestow for voluntary acts of gallantry and self-sacrifice.

Hence it is that the people of the sea-coast view as an act of peculiar meanness and selfishness, and utterly wanting that spirit of justice, generosity, and honorable dealing which until now we had supposed them to possess, the efforts of the officers of the Navy to gain control of the life-saving service and fill it with the class of men which the bill of Senator SARGENT proposes. The service has been organized upon a most intelligent and practical plan for the officers of the revenue-marine service. The life-saving station-keepers are selected from those among us who have ever been leaders in efforts to rescue the distressed. These keepers in turn select their crews from among those who have always been ready to follow them into scenes of danger and imminent peril; and along the whole coast of Massachusetts the life-saving stations are filled with picked men; would say that in the parts of the coast protected by the stations we have no class of men to correspond to that of the common sailor, (so called,) found both in the naval or merchant service of the United States. Our young men entering that profession can soon rise to places of trust and command, and such a thing as an "old sailor" outside of the large cities is not known.

An experienced surfman fit to encounter the breakers upon these shores cannot be had on the coast on the terms and under the conditions that the bill of the Navy men propose. The men employed at the stations on this coast are thrifty and enterprising citizens, the accumulators and holders of property, the heads of families, and such as make up any well-ordered community; and we view with extreme solicitude the introduction among us of a class of men of such habits as the carrying out of the provisions of Mr. SARGENT's bill will bring. Our property is largely in vessels, and our citizens largely employed in commanding them, and we acknowledge and highly appreciate the valuable assistance the officers of the revenue-cutters render, in the winter, to our imperiled property and citizens during their cruising along the coast, and our interests and sympathies are entirely with the revenue officers in the attempt of the officers of the Navy against them. The officers of the Navy we have helped to educate at the public expense for a certain purpose, and we expect and demand that they attend to it. We half-pay and pension them when unfit for active service. With this amount of public petting I should suppose that they would possess sufficient modesty to attend to their own business. They should let the men who for generations have, unnoticed, served suffering and perishing humanity, and need no instructions from naval officers how to do it, attend to theirs.

NAVAL SUPERNUMERARIES.

If this letter is too harsh upon any officers of the Navy, they have brought it upon themselves. I have no rigorous criticism to make upon those officers. Doubtless their number is in excess of the present or prospective needs of the country, and the Naval Academy is every year turning out more of them whose services are needless. But have I not shown that it is not economy to employ this service for life-saving? Do we need stipendiaries in the Army and Navy? Last year we appropriated $7,600,000 for the Navy. Four millions of this went to commissioned officers alone, and the remainder to seventy-five hundred enlisted men. We have admirals, vice-admirals, and rear-admirals, commanders, lieutenant-commanders, captains, lieutenants, masters, ensigns, midshipmen, medical corps, pay corps, engineers of three classes, chaplains, professors, instructors, and cadets. Their pay ranges from $13,000 to $500 per annum. Besides, we have an amphibious marine corps, living on both water and land and useful on neither. What an array of officers, for instance, at the Washington navy-yard; much more, what a useless array to bear our flag around the world, with no commerce to protect! If these supernumeraries desire to intrench upon the functions of other officers, better at once give them notice and dismiss them. These naval officers are too genteel to perform the practical duties on the revenue-marine cruisers; nor will they lessen the expense. The cost of keeping in commission a vessel in the Navy similar in size to the revenue cruiser is nearly four times as much as for the revenue vessel on active duty. For this I have official proof; I defy contradiction. For three vessels of each service of about the same tonnage (the naval aggregate being the least) the expense per ton of the naval vessels is $144.14; that of the revenue marine $48.56; difference in favor of revenue marine, $95.58 per ton. The revenue marine is an exception in one respect to other branches of service. While it has increased its work it has lessened its expense. From 1868, when it was $1,293,661.67, it was $841,176.31 last year. Its average of vessels assisted in distress up from 1860 to 1870 was one hundred and nineteen; the average since is one hundred and ninety-six per annum. During the same period the average of the lives saved was as 17 to 56.

NAVAL OFFICERS AS DIPLOMATS, SURVEYORS, AND OTHER FUNCTIONARIES.

For want of something to do naval officers are suggested for diplomatic and other service. I have before me Senate bill No. 717, to use them in a civil-service reform, as Indian, pension, diplomatic, and other such service as may be compatible. Admiral Porter, in his testimony before the investigating committee of Mr. WHITTHORNE in 1876, page 296, complacently tells us:

> We look upon it that a minister is sent abroad to preserve peace, not make war, and naval officers, having so much intercourse with the world, consider that they are perhaps as well informed about diplomatic matters as persons who have just entered upon their diplomatic duties for the first time. Now, in England it is different. There persons are educated for the diplomatic profession, and a British naval officer in many cases is put under the orders of the minister.

There is a good deal of this sort of testimony given by Admiral Porter before the committee, which must be highly instructive to the legal gentlemen composing it. The upshot of the Admiral's testimony was that we should be careful to select our ministers and consuls from the Navy and keep the politicians, scholars, and statesmen at home.

Some years ago a hydrographic office was uselessly instituted, and hundreds of thousands of dollars wasted in its service by naval officers to give them employment. In one instance a large steamer was employed for eight months on the southern coast in hydrographic survey. When completed it was found that, owing to incorrect determination of the trigonometrical points and the consequent indetermination of the lines of soundings, the services were useless. A depth of ten fathoms was shown on their field chart where the inspector's sounding line indicated shoal water. Their channels were sand-bars, and their shoals blue water.

WHO ARE SURFMEN.

We do not want soldiers or sailors for the surf. We want surfmen who are mostly fishermen. Our fisheries are no less the nursery of coast navigation than the nurture of men. It is often the case that when our vessels order their boats lowered from the davits and sent ashore through a line of breakers by mere sailors the boats are swamped. There is as much difference between a seaman and a surfman as between a seaman and a marine. What would young naval lieutenants know about our perilous coasts, compared with the men who have gained experience from long residence there? An old surfman writes to me that "much has been said about brave jack-tars making good surfmen, but put the captain of a canal-boat on board of a ship in mid-ocean in a heavy gale." He makes a picture of such a scene. When it is all icy so that the ablest seaman hesitates to go aloft, while the mate shouts out in thunder tones "Lay aloft there, you land-lubber, and furl that royal!" "Where, then," he asks, "would be that captain, albeit familiar to the raging canal?"

The trade of battling with breakers when mountain-high is hard to be learned, and never learned to perfection. "There are men here," he writes, "who have launched their boats in the surf for the last forty years; they are learning something every day." Who will say that these men are not superior to any that can be produced from a man of war?

It may be all right for our honorable Speaker, on the principle of amateurship I suppose, to appoint a gentleman from the interior, like my friend from Tennessee, on the Naval Committee as chairman. He comes within the poetic description of Wordsworth:

> Though inland far he be
> His soul has sight of that immortal sea,
> Can in a moment travel thither,
> And see the children sport upon the shore,
> And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

But this is as fanciful a picture as the use of blue-water sailors for coast and surf duties. He might manage a flat-boat, or perhaps could sail upon the open deep, as a navigator, and be able to tell me the difference between a sky-scraper and a scupper, or between a garboard-streak and a first futtock! But what could he do in the league-long rollers thundering on the shore or how clamber up their watery Alps and go through or over them in safety, as a sea-bird touches the bounding billow? Experientia docet.

THE INEFFABLE GLORY OF LIFE-SAVING.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that we have one beautiful statute, which has a sacred halo around it. It makes a sunshine in the shadow of our selfish, sectional, and patriotic codes and laws. It is that which preserves human life. It is not merely a sentimental humanity, but a real benefaction. Like the orange-tree, it bears fruit and flowers at the same time. No language can make more emphatic that which every member must feel in contemplating its inestimable beauty and beneficence. It is no exaggeration to say, in view of its object, that it gives us a glimpse, though dim, of the golden age. The world's heart clings to it, as if it were a memory of a past paradise, or the hope of paradise regained. The sea itself plays its mighty minstrelsy in its honor! No reward can adequately remunerate for the saving of precious human life. Men, as Bacon has said, fear death as children fear to go into the dark, and in proportion as they fear, so is their appreciation of its sacredness. There are a thousand deaths in the apprehension of losing life. It is the one terrible enemy. We are used to contemplating it, even in the most loving surroundings of home, as the arch foe of mankind. The silent closing of the flower, around the insect is, however, none the less a death agony, even in the gardens of home.

Life is precious, because its loss cannot be repaired. Jeremy Taylor has told us, that while our senses are double, there is but one death—but once only to be acted, and that in an instant, and upon that instant all eternity depends. Other losses may be recompensed by gains, but loss by death, never! No one is so lordly or powerful as to stay this irreparable loss. Every day puts us in peril. While we think, we die. What care and esteem can equal the eternal weight of human life! Can any legislation be too ample, or adequate for its protection?

To you, inland legislators, far and aloof from the stormful perils of the sea, who sit happily in the blooming circle of household loveliness, it is the one hard lot of life for you to see the silver cord loosed and the golden bowl broken. None but the stoic, and he perhaps is a myth, can sing that sweetest of canticles, Nunc dimittis. But there is a peculiar terror connected with death by shipwreck amidst the leap and clash, boiling and battling of the tempestuous coast. Who can picture the poignancy of such death, in the company of those whose piercing shrieks and prayers typify the worst agonies of human despair?

Who can picture the joy, beyond all joys when in such despair and amidst the double darkness, the cry of "life-boat" rises above the surge of winds and waters. How buoyantly it floats, now under the weight of water, yet insubmergible, and now leaping above on the feathery plume of the wild wave.

> The life-boat; oh! the life-boat!
> We all have known so long,
> A refuge for the feeble,
> The glory of the strong!

It is a part of the progress of our civilization that death shall be wherever possible robbed of its sting, and even the watery grave of its victory; nay, the very stone removed from the sepulcher as if by angel hands, in the revivification of those only not drowned. Who can describe the terror of the long-absent, sacrificed at the threshold of home, in sight of the dear native shore? Think of Margaret Fuller Ossoli! Think of her at Rome, the lover of Italy; the synonym of all that was first fair, first good, first beautiful! What a romance was her life! In Rome, more than a Roman; in Italy, more than an Italian; in America, the emblem of our best thought; in intellect and taste, no parallel, except herself. What infinite and strange forebodings had she before she sailed on the good ship Elizabeth. Out of the flowers, sun, and sympathy of Italy, along with her noble husband and beloved child, she sailed, all-unwillingly, to her home, to her mother, sisters, friends. Passing through pestilence, and at last apast the terrible trials of our coast, in midsummer, she lost by wreck her sweet and benignant hold on our mundane life. She went down with her husband and child in sight of home. Her written thoughts perished with her manuscripts in sight of her home. There was no life-boat to save. She sat in her death-robes twelve hours in sight of the Fire Island sands on the Long Island beach. Ossoli and her child and her noble self, they perished as one. She went from the storms of time and sea to the infinite One who opened the doorway to the white throne.

STORM PIRATES.

It is within the memory of men present when the name "wrecker" was a synonym for the "storm pirate." Upon the Cornish and the Jersey coasts he preyed upon the dangers and calamities of the sea. Much has been done in England, from time to time, by her shipping acts to mitigate the barbarities, cruelties, and wrongs which have for so many ages added to the perils of the sea. The most terrible penalties have been enacted against despoiling the wreck and murdering the shipwrecked. It was the disgrace of the centuries. But, happy change, the world rolls on, the footfall of progress is audible; every form which the inventive mind can adopt is called in requisition by human governments to rescue life.

STORM WARRIORS.

It has always been a law among nations that salvage should be allowed for the rescue of property in ships. It was but the other day that an English court gave a large sum to the heroes of the sea who brought the floating obelisk of Egypt safely to port. It is but a year ago the life-saving service on the Jersey coast saved two millions of bullion for our Treasury. But it is of more recent date, and from a better spirit, that the savior of human life not only can be rewarded with a salary under government, but by medals of honor and the laudation of the good. It was but the other day that I picked up a volume by a minister of the Gospel about the life-boat work on the Goodwin Sands. He pictures a familiar scene of a century ago. With the skill of an artist he surrounds a company of low-browed villains with the environment of darkness, wildness, and storm, on a cliff near the sea. They plot for the destruction of a vessel. It is the story of Nagg's Head over again. A white horse is led along the edge of the cliff; a lantern is tied upon him; the light sways with the movements of the animal, not unlike the masthead-light of a vessel rocked by the sea. A ship is making steadily for the land. The captain grows uneasy. He will put his vessel round. The lookout man reports a dim light ahead. "What kind? Weather away." "Ay, ay, sir! 'tis a ship-light, for it is in motion." Yes, it must be a vessel standing on the same course with this. The captain will go on. There is a lull in the storm. A hoarse murmur is heard. It is the sound of the sea beating upon the rocks. Lo, a white gleam upon the water. Breakers ahead! Down with the helm! Round her to! Too late! too late! Crash! A shudder from stem to stern; the shriek of voices in agony; the sweep of the seas over the vessel. Broken timbers, and cargo, and lifeless bodies lie along the beach. No! One living body is thrown among the rocks. Dead men tell no tales. Murder closes the tragedy.

Think! all these pirates of the tempest have given way to the storm warriors, the life-boat, the howitzer, the rocket's flash, the hope-signals of safety, the salvation of human life. Can there be a nobler object for human legislation?

Imagine a wreck upon our coast in January! A steamer of three thousand tons burden is steaming through the rain, cold, and darkness. Unconsciously she approaches land. She has a pilot on board, but there is an error in sounding. There is a southeast wind and a heavy sea. Her immense dusky hulk is shadowed against the night like a living monster. Her gloomy lights are shades. They glimmer as faint stars gleam through clouds. How can words paint the scene? If there be one artist whose genius alone could do it it is Turner, he who has portrayed the tossing sea and its wild crests, the desperate passengers and reckless crew, the broken rudder and general menace of the wreck. Add to his genius the obscurity of a Rembrandt, with his shadows unbroken in their blackness save by little flashes of luster, and fill the dim object with the throbbing enginery of man trying to mate the surging sea, and you have all that the eye can see of this unspeakable terror.

Hardly do we discern her hull, her smoke-stack, her masts and yards projected in black against the gloom when we hear the noise of her steam, the mightly clank and throb of her engines mingling with the rustle of the rain and the weltering shocks of the seas as she rushes on with vast undulations,

> Crunching down the brine,
> Like a blind god that feels his way with thunder.

On her deck are a few muffled figures; below, in the berths, are two hundred or more sleeping forms. Suddenly, there is a tremendous shock! Every one on board is thrown down, and the sleepers below are dashed about pell-mell. Then, above the din is a storm of screams. The ship is in a strong convulsion, pounding upon the sand! The engines stop, but the bell is still ringing, the whistles are shrieking, but amidst and above the hissing of steam, the swash of the ocean, the shouts of command, are the human yells of dismay.

What does all this mean? It means that the steamer is hard aground on a bar, plunging and writhing with an ominous straining, and cracking through all her huge bulk as if in the gripe of some vast hand. Gradually she settles with slanting deck, over which, to and fro, in the darkness, run half-clad, tottering figures.

The rain matters little, for around her, like a shoal of monsters, are the winding seas; and there, on her lee, a few hundred yards off, in the gloom, up-shaking and down-falling, pallidly, with ominous uproar, are the breakers. She is stranded on the Jersey shore! Well may there be horror and confusion and dismay! Between her freight of souls and the land is that unstable wall of surf. The storm increases and the heavy coils of water swirling round her rise and lick off her oaken planking as with the tongues of hydras, and the great surges club the bottom with her hull until they break her kelson! This is the wreck! Where is the savior?

Suddenly, amidst the confusion and alarm, there is a whiz of ruddy light, and there, vivid, in a sort of orb of ruddy bloom, stands a figure, holding high above his head a baton from which flies the red fire. It is the patrol of the life-saving service. They stare at him from their unsteady deck. A cheer bursts out from them. "God be thanked! we are seen! help is at hand!" Then, in the last flicker of the expiring Coston light, their hearts sink again, as they see the patrolman race away. He bounds off to the station. It is near three o'clock in the dark January morning. By four he is back again, now as one of a crew of seven whom he has summoned. They are all hot and blowsed, and splashed from head to foot with the mire of a winter road, through which for a mile they have dragged the surf-boat. They pause only to take a look! Then they bend, all together, to the launch. Along the beach is a wall of ice three feet high, over which they clamber, slipping and floundering, with the heavy boat. Once over the barrier they drag on, over great jags and bowlders of ice which pave the beach, to the edge of the water. There, before them, is a boiling surf, full of enormous ice-cakes. Whitening, thundering, crashing, and rising, spreading and tumbling incessantly the slabs of ice with deafening uproar, looms that appalling abattis of breakers through which they will force out the boat to the vessel. In vain! Drenched and bruised, blown and reeking with the effort, they again clamber over the ice-barrier. Another crew from a more distant station arrives, and the keeper in command gasps out the order which sends the men to the station for the mortar apparatus. Boats are useless. Now for the ordnance! The wreck artillery arrives and prepares for action. Suddenly the keeper sees a light near the water, alongside the steamer. His heart bounds with fear. It is the old folly; a boat from the ship to the shore! The deep-water sailor sees only the smooth line of the shore, instead of a swarm of enormous turbines, whirling all under and into the caverns of the brine! Keeper and beachmen rush forward with their warning cries by voice and trumpet. In vain! The light starts on its phantom passage. It is borne in a boat with twelve sailors! Like the specter from the shadow of the steamer they see the little white craft emerge upon the summit of a huge wave. One moment's poise, and it flies smoothly toward them, so swiftly, so lightly, that it seems in one second more it will be upon the shore, and then, in another instant, as by some deft magic, it has feathered over, crewless, and keel upward, caught in the turbine wheels of the surf. Has the crew perished? No. Dark spots are seen struggling in the fuzz of the foam, and the voice of the keeper bursts forth with the loud "Come on, over the ice-wall, men!" They plunge into the under-tow. There they are, braced on legs of bronze, resisting with all the might of hip and loin the hideous suck and swirl of the waters, staving off the ice-slabs, and clutching for the drowning men! Four of these figures are dragged from the surf. They are heaved upward over the icy barrier. Another powerful tussle in the foam, and they master four more. Another desperate struggle and one more is saved. Two more are seen but cannot be saved. Another struggle, and the gallant keeper totters, gripped by a drowning man; the under-tow, like an accomplice, winds around him, and throws him down; the mad body clings to him and he cannot rise. In that moment of awful extremity the sea floods in upon them with its deathful roar, lifts and throws them inland, but before it can wash them back the keeper catches at a pile of ice and holds on. This enables him to resist the fearful siphonage of the under-tow, and with a desperate effort he regains his feet and makes for the shore. It is his last chance for life—a single second's delay and the surge may wash him down—but in that moment he does not forget that there is another life to save besides his own, and, furious, with the sea upon his heels, he seizes his man and staggers on, dragging this human weight behind him. A mate rushes to his assistance; the surf falls in a crushing flood behind them. They are safe, and one more body rescued. Of the twelve men of the boat's crew, three have perished. Nine have been drawn from the ocean by this little band of heroes.

Is this a fanciful picture? No! This is what took place at the wreck of the French steamer Amerique, near Seabright, New Jersey, on the 11th of January, 1877. The day was Sunday. A Sabbath day for a Sabbath deed. That heroic keeper, whose breast deserves to be covered with decorations, was Abner H. West, of station No. 3. Those three men, deserving of equal honor, who wrought with him in the ice and under-tow to save those lives, and whose names I regret I do not know, were members of the station crew. How they and their mates toiled later, and achieved that splendid rescue of all on board the French steamer, with which the country rang, is a matter of public record. Such labor and danger! Is there a splendor equal to its heroism? How that day they traversed the shore between the station and the wreck, lugging their heavy cart, before they could get the mortar apparatus and life-car to the scene; how, after two hours of hard pulling and hauling, they were there with it, drenched with sweat, clotted with mire, alive with energy; how, with thud and gun-flash, their shot-lines fled swishing to the steamer, the hawser and the hauling-lines dragged aboard; how day broke, and again, with desperate labor, the effort was made to launch the boat through the surf and ice-floes; how difficult it was to get near the vessel, to make her foreign officers understand how to attach the life-lines; how, at last, the launch was achieved and, despite the breakers and currents which engirt the steamer with a circle of hell-pools, the boat's crew got near enough to make their instructions known, and the slender bridge of rope for the life-car, narrow as the line Mohammed saw floating across the gulf to Paradise, was drawn taut from the vessel to the shore—these were a few of the incidents of that night and day. To and fro, hung by its rings to the hawser, and hauled backward and forward by those arms of brawn, sped the life-car with its burden of human lives—six or eight at a time, men, women, and children, till all were landed. Then the baggage of the passengers, the trunks with their wealth of apparel and adornment, the mails with their written weight of more than wealth, and the bullion of the Treasury, followed the delivered lives in the same car. First, as I have said elsewhere, we save the man, and then his gems and gold. Is there salvage sufficient to recompense such service?

The Amerique was seen by the patrolman at three o'clock in the morning. They toiled incessantly, never pausing for a mouthful of food or to change their soaked clothing—stern, pale, unflagging, bemired, bedraggled, rough, weary, indomitable, and magnificent. Such were they, and such, in very feeble outlines and faint colors, have I endeavored to display their heroic work at the wreck of the Amerique on that Sabbath day which they thus kept holy. Laborare est orare.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible personally not to felicitate myself upon having given much earnest study to this life-saving legislation. It would not perhaps be in good taste to boast of having been instrumental in its organization and improvement. The inspiration for what I have done, however, came out of a storm upon the Scilly Isles, in the winter of 1868, when a great steamer barely escaped shipwreck. It was the worst tempest in thirty years upon that coast. When we arrived in port the day after the peril, the English journals were full of the glorious exploits by rocket and signal and coast-guard and mortar and life-boat. I wondered if so much could be done in England, with her forty-five hundred miles of coast line, why should not our country, with double that number of miles, have a similarly efficient service. It was this that led me to propose what the superintendent of the service called the efficient beginning of the patrol of the Jersey coast. Since that time how much has been done for the well-being and rescue of imperiled human life! How much of comfort and joy has been vouchsafed to families and friends of the beneficiaries, of that mercy which droppeth as the gentle rains from heaven in this warm-hearted legislation, blessing and blessed!

REWARD OF THE SERVICE.

Mr. Speaker, I have spent the best part of my life in this public service; most of it has been like writing in water. The reminiscences of party wrangling and political strife seem to me like nebulæ of the past, without form and almost void. Gladly I would if I could, for many reasons growing out of personal inconvenience and party competency, reverse much that I have done here. Confessing so much inadequacy, recalling so many who have come and gone from this House—gone, many of them, to another sphere, and, I hope and trust, a better world—I would gladly lay down my commission and turn to other duties, which the lapse of time admonishes me should have attention. But what little I have accomplished in connection with this life-saving service is compensation "sweeter than the honey in the honey-comb." It is its own exceeding great reward. It speaks to me in the voices of the rescued; ay, in tears of speechless feeling; speaks of resurrection from death, "in spite of wreck and tempest's roar; in spite of false lights on the shore;" speaks of a faith triumphant over all fears in the better elements of our human nature. It sounds like the undulations of the Sabbath bell, ringing in peace and felicity. It comes to me in the words of Him who, regardless of his own life, gave it freely that other lives might be saved.

Humanity and civilization should walk white-handed along with government. They strengthen and save society. In the perils which environ our country, from passion and prejudice, from old animosities and new irritations, let us do good deeds—pray hopefully that our vessel of state be free from leakage, collision, wreck, and loss. Send out the life-boat; fire the line over the imperiled vessel; free the hawser for the life-car, and then with stout hearts and thankful souls lift up our prayer to Him who holds the sea in the hollow of His hand:

Jesu, bless our gallant boat
By the torrent swept along;
Loud its threatenings—let them not
Drown the music of a song
Breathed Thy mercy to implore
Where these troubled waters roar.

Guide our bark among the waves,
Through the surf our passage smooth,
Where the whirlpool frets and raves
Let Thy love its anger soothe.
All our hope is placed in Thee.
Miserere, Domine!

Mr. ROBERTS. I call the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1896) for the relief of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York;

An act (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4988) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute superintendents of mints or assayers in assay offices assistant treasurers of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up for consideration the unfinished business of last week, being the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means relating to internal revenue.

Mr. REAGAN. That bill has been displaced by the action of the House and is not now privileged. The gentleman in charge of that bill gave way for the one which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] give way?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly he did.

Mr. BURCHARD. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. REAGAN. I said that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] had yielded to allow other business to come up.

The SPEAKER. He yielded for the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. And also for business after the morning hour.

Mr. BURCHARD. I yielded for the morning hour and insisted that the bill should not lose its place.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to call up the interstate commerce bill and dispose of it to-day.

Mr. BURCHARD. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. WOOD,] who has the tariff bill in charge, gave notice that he would call up that bill to-day. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who has the floor upon that bill, is obliged soon to leave the city, and he desires to have the bill brought up to-day. Of course, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. WOOD] makes the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill, I will have to yield to him. I agreed that I would not press the consideration of my bill as against the tariff bill. Otherwise I am bound to insist that the internal-revenue bill shall be taken up as unfinished business. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] of course can take me off the floor by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now go into Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill.

Mr. REAGAN. On that motion I raise the question of consideration in favor of the interstate commerce bill. It will require but an hour or two to dispose of the bill, for I will call the previous question upon it as soon as possible, and I hope gentlemen will let us dispose of the bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. The mode by which the gentleman can reach his object is to negative the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. And pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the tariff bill be limited to four hours.

Mr. WILSON. Say one hour.

Mr. CONGER. Two hours.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would be willing to shorten my own speech, but there are four members of the committee who desire to be heard.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask this question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD:] whether should the proposition to limit debate upon the tariff bill to four hours prevail, we can after that get at the bill so as to dispose of it once and forever? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURCHARD. That is a question for the future to determine.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] must know that this House is not in favor of passing this bill. I ask him, therefore, if he will help us to come to a vote upon the bill?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman frow Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] and also to this House, that whatever may become of this bill, they do not get rid of the question "now and forever."

Mr. O'NEILL. Let the future take care of itself. But I will say to the gentleman that he ought to know that the time of the House should not be wasted upon a bill that is practically dead.

Mr. YOUNG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. I want to know whether, should the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] prevail, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, can I raise the question of consideration as to different bills?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can in Committee of the Whole move to lay aside any bill. The control of the business in Committee of the Whole is with the committee.

Mr. YOUNG. That is what I want to know.

The SPEAKER. And the only technical motion known in the House for reaching the Committee of the Whole is the motion made by the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. The bill which I desire to call up is one which has been the unfinished business for a number of weeks, and it is one of great public importance. If it is the purpose of the House by indirection to defeat action upon this bill, I desire to know it. Upon this vote whether we shall go into Committee of the Whole, I hope the friends of the bill I have referred to will insist upon the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in reply to the gentleman from Texas that his bill was the unfinished business, but by the action of the House the internal-revenue bill was put in advance of it as unfinished business. Whenever the internal-revenue bill shall be disposed of the Chair will recognize the bill of the gentleman from Texas as unfinished business.

Mr. REAGAN. One word. The Committee of Ways and Means having in charge the internal-revenue bill gave way first for the morning hour and they now give way for another matter.

The SPEAKER. They cannot help that.

Mr. REAGAN. But they have no right to "farm out" the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. They do not "farm out the time of the House." On the contrary, the motion of the gentleman from New York is in order under the rules; and it is not in the power of the gentleman from Illinois, who has charge of the internal-revenue bill, to prevent the motion. So that the gentleman from Illinois is in no manner "farming out" the time of the House. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York in his right under the rules.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman from New York has made a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole. I want to understand how it is that other gentlemen get the floor and speak upon the question whether that motion shall be adopted, the question not being debatable.

The SPEAKER. Because it is desirable the House should understand the effect of the various propositions and the objects which members have in view in making them.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, sir, I now raise the point of order that the gentleman from New York having made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, no other matter is debatable, and that we must take the vote on that question before considering any other.

The SPEAKER. It is always in order to ask parliamentary questions.

Mr. HOOKER. I am aware of that; that is the reason I am asking one now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take notice that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] objects to debate, and will submit the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I desire to make a motion.

Mr. WILSON. Is it competent for me to make a motion to limit debate?

The SPEAKER. Rule 104 will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

104. The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House and Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending and that may be offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I understand that the gentleman from New York allows me to make a preliminary motion to limit debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York as recognized by the rules is a motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole. Now a motion to suspend the rules brings the House to a vote directly on the proposition, if it be insisted on, as against any other motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman from New York yields to me to make my motion.

Mr. WOOD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the tariff bill all general debate be limited to four hours.

Mr. WILSON. Say two hours.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] by striking out "four hours" and inserting "two hours."

Mr. GARFIELD. Personally I would be willing to assent to the proposition for two hours, abridging my own remarks accordingly, but there are several gentlemen still desiring to be heard.

Mr. WOOD. Five members of the committee desire yet to speak, and less than four hours will not be sufficient. I shall not consent to the limitation of two hours.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to limit debate to two hours.

Mr. WOOD. I will not yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to make the motion if he admits an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not admit the amendment; if the rules of the House admit it I cannot help it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York yielded, and of course the yielding was subject to the rules of the House. The gentleman from Ohio made his motion and that motion is amendable. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, there were—ayes 96, noes 51.

Mr. WOOD. I call for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. We may as well have the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. Perhaps we can settle this question by tellers.

Mr. WOOD. I should ask the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I knew we must come to that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in affirmative—yeas 131, nays 88, not voting 72; as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. MITCHELL. I announce that my colleague, Mr. OVERTON, is paired with Mr. GLOVER.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I am paired with Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] as amended on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not that carry the bill with it?

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire whether it is in order to move to lay upon the table a motion affecting the order of business? That is the motion now pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet entertained the motion.

Mr. HALE. That is the point I made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose I move to adjourn, and the gentleman from Mississippi should move to lay that on the table?

Mr. HOOKER. As I understand, the vote which has just been taken by yeas and nays was on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. The House voted on that proposition, and the Speaker stated that the question now recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. I therefore move now to lay the motion as thus amended on the table. That motion certainly is not subject to the objections suggested either by the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Of course the motion to lay on the table does not carry the bill with it, the bill being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALE. That is not my point. My point is that the motion which the gentleman from Mississippi moves to lay on the table is a motion fixing the order of business in regard to a measure, and that such a motion cannot be laid on the table.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman's point is not well taken. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio was to limit debate to four hours. The amendment was to limit debate to two hours. The House has adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan in preference to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. And certainly it is in order now to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio as amended on the table.

Mr. HALE. But the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is in the nature of fixing the order of business. It limits the debate which is a part of the order of the business of the House to four hours. That has been amended so as to make the time two hours, and such a motion as that is not subject to another motion to lay it on the table. As the gentleman from Ohio illustrated it, if a motion is made to adjourn or to ask a recess you must take the question directly on the order of business as indicated by such a motion and cannot move to lay it on the table.

Mr. HOOKER. But this is not exactly in the nature of order of business. It is a privileged question to move to lay on the table. The amendment having been adopted, the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. And if in the first instance I could have moved to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the table, then I can do so now.

Mr. HALE. But you could not make the motion then.

Mr. HOOKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. When the gentleman from Ohio made his motion it was certainly competent to move to lay it on the table. That is one of the privileged motions on every question that can arise in the House. It is a privileged motion, which may be made in preference to every other on any matter that comes before the House. This is a proposition to limit debate in Committee of the Whole. I propose to lay that on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. The power to lay on the table, according to parliamentary usage, is the power to lay upon the table a measure such as a bill or some legislative proceeding or some amendment which carries with it the bill. Now, this motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is not a motion to lay a measure upon the table, or an amendment to a measure; but it is a motion to lay upon the table an ordinary motion about the order of business. It would be easy to illustrate the absurdity of this. What would follow if this were in order? I could now, if the principle contended for by the gentleman from Mississippi be correct, move to lay his motion on the table, and then another member could rise and move to lay mine on the table, and there never would be an end; we would have motion upon motion forever if that principle were allowed. Suppose I move to take a recess——

Mr. WOOD. This is one of the methods by which a proposition is defeated. It seems to me that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is perfectly in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me finish what I was saying on this point. Suppose I moved to take a recess till half past seven o'clock, the Speaker surely would not hold that that motion could be laid on the table. Suppose I moved to go to business on the Speaker's table and the motion was made to lay my motion on the table. If that principle were allowed we would be completely bound hand and foot in the ordinary transaction of business. I do not remember of this question ever having been raised before.

There is one motion somewhat similar to this, a motion to reconsider and lay on the table which usually follows the passing of a measure. But that is special; it is understood to be for the sake of ending a matter, and stands by itself as the only motion of its kind known to parliamentary law. All other motions to lay on the table are motions to lay measures on the table.

The SPEAKER. The measure on which it is proposed to limit debate is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and cannot be got at in that way.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am quite aware of that.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio point out any part of the rules where a motion to lay on the table a motion to limit debate, or in fact to lay on the table any motion, is prohibited?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot say that there is anything in the rules that directly prohibits it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees that this is an entirely novel motion. It is one at all events that is new in the experience of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Is a motion to limit debate debatable?

The SPEAKER. Questions as to the priority of business are not debatable.

Mr. EDEN. The object ordinarily of a motion to lay on the table is to cut off debate when the House does not desire debate.

The SPEAKER. The position of the question as it stands now is that the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to limit debate to four hours as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, which has prevailed, substituting two hours.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make this further point, which has not yet been made, that the House is dividing upon this proposition and that therefore the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to lay on the table till that division is effected is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The House has not divided. The Chair would submit the question to the House on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as amended by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] whereupon the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] moved to lay the motion as amended upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. But the House had already taken the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the division had not commenced upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CONGER. That is a part of the same question that the vote has been taken on.

The SPEAKER. No division had been reached at all.

Mr. RIDDLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What would be the effect of the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi if the question were admitted and it prevailed would be to make no limit to debate upon the tariff bill and the House would again resolve itself into into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4874) for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, a bill (H. R. No. 4422) to amend section 4695 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 1267) fixing the date of the commencement of certain pensions and granting arrears in certain cases; and

A bill (S. No. 864) to provide for the maintenance and operation of a military telegraph in Dakota and Montana Territories.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Senate resolution No. 34, granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., at the soldier's reunion to be held at Centreville, Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent of the House to record my vote upon the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WRIGHT. I vote "ay."

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair, in answer to the objections which have been made by gentlemen on the opposite side, to the ruling on this subject as laid down in our Manual under parliamentary law. By Rule 42 it is provided:

> When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged—and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill or proposition.

And therefore the analogy drawn by the gentleman from Ohio in reference to the motion to adjourn or to lie upon the table does not apply to a case of this kind, which is a proposition to limit the debate of the House upon the pending question to a given period of time.

In Rules 44 and 45, page 109, of the Manual, we find this language:

> A motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall be always in order, and these motions, and the motion to lie on the table, shall be decided without debate.
>
> The hour at which every motion to adjourn is made shall be entered on the Journal.

And yet a proposition to amend the Journal, says the Manual, can be laid upon the table.

I will read also the forty-sixth and forty-seventh rules:

> Any member may call for the division of a question, before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.
> Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that among the motions, in the order in which they are construed by the House, that which occupies the second place in the line of precedence is the motion to lie on the table, and that motion precedes the motion to adjourn. I proposed the motion, and it was a distinct and substantive proposition to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and then the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and limit debate; thereupon I moved to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio upon the table. Now I would like to know the reasons which can be urged why this motion, which was intended to guide and direct the House in which way it shall act and legislate on matters, is not liable to be laid upon the table like any other proposition or bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to consume the time of the House except to say a single word. I have no earthly interest in the decision of this point of order except as it may affect our general practice as to the business of the House for the future. If the House refuses in this case, Mr. Speaker, to sustain the point of order, the House can refuse to lay a motion to close debate upon the table, and it would only take two votes to do it instead of one; therefore this matter of settling the proposition for general debate or no general debate makes no difference in the world, as the House will see in advance that if this should be adopted as a precedent it arms the minority, and I give notice of it in advance, with unlimited power of delaying a measure by dilatory motions to an extent greater than was ever known to have been given to any legislative body.

Suppose we wanted to filibuster, we are now bound down by two motions, the motion to adjourn now and to adjourn to a day certain. But if this ruling becomes a rule of the House we would have forty dilatory motions instead of two. The gentleman behind me might move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, and another might move to lay that motion on the table; and then another gentleman might move to adjourn, and another to lay the motion on the table. There are four votes already. Thus we will have four dilatory motions, when nobody ever understood that the number of dilatory motions exceeded the two which I have named. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is all the time confounding two things which are entirely distinct.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. After I have finished this statement. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is confounding two different things, propositions and motions. Now propositions are bills, joint resolutions, simple resolutions, or amendments to them. He is confounding those propositions with mere motions as to the order of business. The propositions which we lay on the table are bills, resolutions, measures of legislation, and amendments to them. But a motion as to the order of business, like a motion to adjourn, or a motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, or a motion to take up a certain bill in preference to others, or a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, all those are mere motions, not questions of legislation, but mere motions relating to the order of business.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me now to propound a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Does the gentleman consider this motion which I have made a dilatory motion?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. How is it a dilatory motion? It proposes to bring the House directly to a vote upon his proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] should withdraw his motion, the House will then be immediately brought to a vote upon my proposition as amended; and if they vote down the proposition there will be no limit to debate.

Mr. HOOKER. But all that does not reach the question of the power to submit a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Therefore I say that this motion to lay on the table, so far as the pending measure is concerned, has no effect in the world except merely to require two votes for its decision rather than one. If the House votes down the motion to lay on the table, then we will have to vote upon my motion to limit debate; and in that way it will require two votes instead of one to settle the question.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the House will permit me to be heard for two or three minutes on this question, for it is a matter of importance in regard to this subject as well as others. I think the judgment of the Chair will be assisted if I call the attention of the House and of the Chair to the precise character of the question which is submitted to the Chair for his decision.

I was not in the House when this question arose. But, as I understand it, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill. Pending that motion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moved that all general debate upon that bill be limited to four hours. After that came an amendment from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to limit debate to two hours. And the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] moves to lay the latter motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state exactly the question before the House, so that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] may understand what the question is. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Pending that he yielded to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to make a motion that when the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and take up the tariff bill, all general debate upon that bill shall be limited to four hours. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio so as to limit debate to two hours. On that amendment a yea-and-nay vote was had; and it was adopted by yeas 128, nays 86. The Chair stated the result of the vote, and submitted to the House the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio as amended. Thereupon the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] moved to lay on the table the proposition as amended. The point of order is raised whether the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is in order under the rule.

Mr. BANKS. Whether the motion to lay on the table the motion to limit debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. That is the question.

Mr. BANKS. What is a motion to limit debate? Is it a separate and independent proposition of itself? No, sir; a motion to limit debate is in effect a motion to postpone to a certain time action upon a proposition. When a proposition or bill is brought before the House, it will be voted upon and decided immediately, unless some person rises to debate it. Therefore, when a motion is made to limit debate upon a bill, it is practically a motion to postpone for two hours or four hours, as the case may be, action upon that bill. It is therefore one of those subsidiary motions which is embraced in Rule 42; which rule provides that—

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged.

Now, these motions never are considered as a part of the question under debate, the original bill to be considered, but they concern the manner in which the original question shall be determined. A motion to postpone, therefore, is exactly like a motion to adjourn, or a motion to lay on the table, or a motion to commit, or to amend, or to postpone indefinitely; they are motions relating solely to the order of action upon the original proposition. I do not think the Chair will call to mind a single instance where under any circumstances one of these subsidiary motions was ever laid upon the table by a vote of the House. These motions cannot be made upon each other. The object of a subsidiary motion is to decide the manner in which the main question, the original subject before the House, shall be put; therefore the motion to lay upon the table cannot apply to a subsidiary motion. If there has been any decision upon this question different from the view I now suggest, it certainly is erroneous and should not be followed.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan having prevailed, would it not be in order for the gentleman to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and to lay that motion upon the table?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly. Because that is provided for by a separate rule. The motion to reconsider is an original question and opens debate.

The SPEAKER. Not in the case which the Chair put.

Mr. BANKS. Not on that particular proposition, because the original proposition was not debatable. But the motion to reconsider is not a subsidiary motion; it is an original motion, a subject by itself, following the character of the original subject. Therefore a motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider is entirely in order upon principle, and also because it is expressly provided for by the rules. But a motion to lay a question on the table cannot be followed by a motion to lay that motion on the table. A motion for the previous question cannot be followed by a motion to lay the previous question on the table. The Chair will perceive the distinction which I make between subsidiary motions and original motions. So, also, a motion to commit must be decided directly. You cannot move to lay on the table a motion to commit. I ask the Chair to consult those who are more familiar than myself with the daily practice of the House and ascertain whether there is any precedent which tends to show that any one of these subsidiary motions can be followed by another motion to lay that upon the table.

No, sir; the rule is distinct and absolute. The subject before the House, whatever it may be, light or important, serious or trivial, can be laid on the table or can be committed; but a motion to lay on the table cannot be laid on the table, nor can a motion to commit. A motion to limit debate for two hours is in effect a motion to postpone the decision of the question for two hours.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman recognize as an original motion the motion to reconsider the vote by which a measure was adopted or defeated?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir; that is an original motion not provided for in Rule 42. It is an original motion having all the attributes of the original subject which is to be reconsidered. In the case of the tariff bill a motion to reconsider would open it for debate without limit; the debate might last for weeks. Such a motion to reconsider could be laid on the table because it is of itself an original and distinct subject upon principle. But a subsidiary motion to lay on the table cannot be followed by another subsidiary motion to lay on the table, nor can a motion to commit or a motion to postpone indefinitely be laid on the table. This is the distinction I made.

The SPEAKER. This is a new question. The Chair during his term of service as a member is not able to recollect any case in which such a motion has been made or entertained.

Mr. BANKS. The Speaker will allow me to suggest that he has himself just stated the strongest argument that could be possible against the admission of the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet admitted the proposition. Viewed in the light of a proposition which is amendable, (and this has been amended,) the Chair would incline to treat it as a question arising under Rule 42, so that the motion to lay the proposition on the table would be admissible. But the Chair views this as a matter in regard to the direction of the order of business, and in that light the Chair is of opinion that the proposition is not admissible. He prefers, however, to submit the question to the House for its decision.

Mr. BANKS. Will the Chair allow me to say one word?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not make any ruling on the question.

Mr. BANKS. I wish to state an additional principle. Each one of these subsidiary motions attaches to the main question; and if you lay one of these subsidiary motions on the table, it carries the main question with it. If you lay upon the table an amendment to an original question it carries the original question to the table, except for a special provision in the rules taking an amendment out of the ordinary scope of Rule 42. The general principle is that if you lay a subsidiary question on the table you also lay on the table the subject to which it attaches and from which it cannot be separated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House the question, shall this proposition be received?

Mr. HOOKER. Before the vote is taken I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the changes that have been made in the rule in regard to this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER. Under the rule as originally adopted April 7, 1789, it was provided that—

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received unless to amend it, to commit it, for the previous question, or to adjourn.

On the 13th of November, 1794, the rule was changed so that a motion to postpone to a day certain was introduced next after the previous question. On the 17th of December, 1805, a further change in the rule was made so as to prescribe this order for the different questions:

First, the previous question; second, to postpone indefinitely; third, to postpone to a day certain; fourth, to lie; fifth, to commit; sixth, to amend; seventh, to adjourn.

On the 23d of December, 1811, the order was changed as follows:

First, to adjourn; second, to lie on the table.

Thus the motion to lay on the table any proposition or bill (I care not in what form it appears) was advanced by the House to the dignity of the second privileged motion which could be made; and it applies to every bill or other proposition which can come before this body for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot help viewing this proposition as one in regard to the order in which the business of the House shall be done. Viewing the proposition in that light the Chair is unwilling to decide the motion to be admissible, and he will submit the question to the House. Shall the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi be received to be voted on by the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me suggest to the Chair to put it in this way: Is the proposition of the gentleman in order under the rules of the House? so we shall make a formal ruling.

The SPEAKER. It will stand as a ruling as stated by the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chairs states it, "shall the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi be received?"

The SPEAKER. There is absence of authority in the rules on the subject, and the Chair therefore submits the question to the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. The language of the rule is, "a subject under consideration," and if the meaning of the rule is the question under discussion, I think then this motion to lay upon the table would be in order.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman will notice at once if that is the case the motion would carry the proposition with it, and the measure about which the House is giving its order is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURCHARD. This is not the subject under consideration, but as to what the House will proceed to consider.

Mr. HOOKER. It is a proposition under consideration, and to lay upon the table as one of the ways provided for its disposal.

Mr. BURCHARD. The question is what proposition will it take up.

The question was taken, and the House refused to receive the proposition.

The question then recurred on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now demand a vote be taken on going into committee.

The question recurred on Mr. WOOD'S motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 47.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the yeas and nays with a view of voting this down and taking up the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. TUCKER. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So Mr. WOOD'S motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TUCKER in the chair.)

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to move to lay aside all preceding bills and to take up the one which I will name.

Mr. BURCHARD. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, under the rules of the House, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. Is there any rule of the House which will take me off the floor after I have been recognized? At all events let me make my statement. I wish to submit a motion and I think I have the right to do it, having been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware the gentleman from Illinois occupied the floor. When the gentleman from New York made the motion to go into committee it was with the understanding the tariff bill was to be taken up, and on that bill the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. That is the reason why the gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to the floor. He has not charge of the tariff bill. The gentleman from New York might have had a right to the floor. I cannot conceive why the gentleman from Illinois representing an entirely different bill should have the floor to the exclusion of any other gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois represents the committee who reported this bill.

Mr. YOUNG. The House did not go into committee to consider that or any other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry to say the Chair does not deem it necessary to give any further reason.

Mr. YOUNG. Well, then, I will appeal from the decision of the Chair if he decides against me.

The CHAIRMAN. Unfortunately for the gentleman, the Chair cannot entertain an appeal from his decision as to who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. I never heard of a tribunal from which an appeal did not lie except this and the electoral commission. [Laughter.]

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the tariff bill, on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURCHARD addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Chairman, it is a necessity by taxation in some form to obtain the money required to meet the current expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, and, under existing law, such additional amount as will be necessary to apply to the sinking fund.

This amount, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, as ordinary expenses for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, including interest on the public debt and the sinking fund, is $280,688,796.38. If this estimate is reliable this amount is to be raised, and the question for Congress to determine is how and in what manner it shall be obtained.

The revenue required for the purposes which I have named under existing law is derived principally from customs and internal taxes. It is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report that for the next fiscal year one hundred and thirty-three millions will come from customs and one hundred and twenty millions from internal revenue, derived mainly from the tax on spirits and tobacco, and that, with other revenues, there will under existing law be a deficiency of $11,438,796.38.

This statement imposes upon Congress the duty of supplying this deficiency or changing the law so as to reduce the expenditures to the revenue receipts of the Government under the existing law.

There is no probability that the ordinary expenses of the Government will be to any extent reduced. The interest on the public debt, according to the contract, must be paid or the Government will be dishonored; and the sinking fund ought in good faith to be kept intact, as a pledge of the Government for the public debt. And the other expenses of the Government must be provided for. How, then, shall the estimated deficiency of about eleven and a half million dollars be met?

All taxes are a burden; all ought to be just and equal. But taxes must be levied to support the Government, and when made must be by authority of law.

Under the Constitution three modes of taxation are authorized:

First. A direct tax upon the basis of population, which has, I think, seldom if ever been resorted to;

Second. A tax on special articles like that now in force upon spirits and tobacco; and Third. A duty imposed upon articles of foreign manufacture, coming in competition with home productions.

Now, however the revenue required for the support of the Government is raised, there is no way in which it can be done without imposing a burden on the people. The question, therefore, is what is the best mode of raising the revenue required. If under existing law there is a surplus of revenue, what taxes ought to be reduced; or if under the law there is a deficiency, what taxes ought to be increased?

If there is a surplus will you reduce the duties on foreign products which come in competition with home industries, or would it not be wiser to reduce the tax on specified articles from which now the internal-revenue tax is derived? If there is a deficiency in the revenue would it not be wiser to derive as much of this as possible from customs, and thus avoid any additional tax upon home products? It is no time by any change in the tariff to reduce the amount now derived from customs. The depressed condition of all the industries of the country demand the protection which they now receive, and no change in this respect should be made unless the purpose is to destroy them and leave the country dependent upon foreign countries.

The true policy, in my judgment, is to derive from duties on foreign products the largest revenue which can be obtained, and in this way to encourage and stimulate home products, employ our own labor, and diversify the industries of the country; and in case of any deficiency from this source to obtain it only to the extent which is required by a tax on specific articles, selecting such as are not necessaries, and if possible such as are luxuries or injurious to health, as is now done in the taxes imposed upon spirits and tobacco. Whether the revenue is derived from the one or the other of these sources it is equally a tax upon the people; but if upon foreign products, it would be a benefit to the industry of the country, and if upon spirits or tobacco it will be paid by those who use them.

I say, therefore, that the true policy is to obtain from customs the largest possible amount of revenue and to make up the deficiencies by taxation on specific articles.

Either direct taxation for the expenses of the Government or taxes on specific articles of home products tend to the idea of free trade as the national policy.

Duties imposed upon foreign products in competition with like home products will result in adopting the protective principle as the national policy.

I am for protecting, as against foreigners, the home industries to the extent that is necessary to give the home industry a reasonable chance to compete with the foreign product.

Free trade is a fiction. It is based upon the idea that the nations of the earth are one, and not separate; that their relations are the same, and not distinct; that what may be for the interest of one is for the interest of all, and that each can best subserve its own interests by doing what will be for the best interests of all others.

I am not quite prepared to admit that any such disinterested feeling exists between the nations of the world.

On the other side, the protective system seeks to adjust itself to things as they really are, and is based upon the idea that the nations of the earth are in all things which pertain to their nationality separate and distinct.

In the differences which exist between the principal nations, under different forms of government, with different interests, and with diverse customs and habits, the only true policy for each is to take care of itself. And not only the best, but the only way in which any nation can take care of itself is to do what will advance its own prosperity without regard to any other nation. No other principle can be adopted until the interests of all nations shall be the same, and that time has not yet come.

Free trade may be for the interest of England or other countries, but may be destructive of the best interests of this country.

Labor and capital in England compared with this country are cheap. This country cannot in its industries compete with this inequality without protection.

Without such protection the result would be that we would be dependent upon England or other countries for many articles of necessity which are now produced in this country and in the production of which its labor is now employed and its capital invested.

England, as other nations, is under a different form of government from that under which we live. Her government is monarchical, ours is free but complex; national and state, one as a nation, but separate as States with a diversity of interests.

Our true policy as a nation is to take care of each other as States. Under the theory of free trade we become dependent upon other nations for whatever we need as well in peace as in war. Under the protective system we develop the resources of the country, produce what we need by our own labor, and are alike in peace and war independent of any and all foreign nations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is a deficiency in the revenues, the true way, if any change is made in the tariff, is to make such change as will result in an increase of revenue from the duty on imports, and not as now by the effect of this bill to reduce the amount; and not to supply the deficiency either by suspending the sinking fund, or by imposing a tax upon tea and coffee, or by reviving the odious and unjust income tax, for which there never was any excuse except in time of war, and which is without any apology in time of peace.

To meet this deficiency by suspending the sinking fund would dishonor the country in its plighted faith, to impose the income tax when the property from which it is derived is taxed to its full amount would be unjust, and to impose a tax upon tea and coffee would be a tax upon what in this country are necessaries of life among all classes of our citizens.

It would be more equitable and just to devise some mode of imposing duties upon foreign products which come in competition with home industries, and in this way increase the revenues derived from imposts on foreign products, and thus reduce the deficiencies and prevent to that extent the necessity of imposing upon home industries a tax for any deficiency which may exist.

If, however, a deficiency does exist, in what way can it be more equitably met than under the existing law by obtaining it from spirits and tobacco? Neither of these are necessaries of life. Indeed, they are injurious rather than beneficial. It would be far better if they were not used at all. But they are in use, and probably will continue to be, and the tax which may be imposed upon them will not prevent their use, and it will be paid by those who indulge in their use, and therefore will be paid, not by the growers of tobacco and the manufacturers of distilled spirits, but by the consumers of these articles.

The true course is to obtain from duties imposed upon foreign products which come in competition with home industries the largest revenue we can, and then to make up the deficiency by a tax upon specific articles, selecting such as are not necessary for the comforts of life but such as are either luxuries or injurious to health. And to do this, by common consent the articles of tobacco and spirits have been designated as the most appropriate upon which to impose this tax.

The policy heretofore has been to reduce the internal-revenue taxes. They have, since peace was restored, been reduced until now they are limited to a few articles, but few of which are a necessity. These have been retained only to make up any deficiency of revenue not raised by customs dues. The deficiency which now exists shows the necessity of retaining all the revenue which can be derived from the duties on imports under the existing laws. With these it is necessary to retain a portion of the internal-revenue taxes.

The true policy, I repeat, is to obtain from customs dues the largest amount possible, and to make up the deficiency by taxes upon home products.

Inasmuch as all the revenue derived from duties on foreign products which come in competition with home industries is required for the purposes of the Government, there surely is no necessity of reducing the amount that is now received, and especially when by such reduction the deficiency must be made up in some other way.

The principle of protection to home industries is the true policy of this Government. It is a principle, not of local, but of general application to all the industries of the country.

The theory of free trade is also based upon a principle. It assumes that all nations are one in their interests, and without any material, national, or political interests in conflict. The principle of protection assumes the separate and independent existence of this country, with material, political, and national interests in conflict with other nations; and its policy upon this subject has been based upon this idea; and hence from the beginning of this Government it has pursued the policy of taking care of itself, and has left other nations, as they have heretofore and will continue to do hereafter, to pursue such policy as they may deem will best promote their interests.

As free trade is a principle which must be applied, if at all, generally, so the policy of protection is a principle to be applied to all the industries in the country to the extent that is necessary to encourage these industries and to employ labor and capital in their development.

The principle of protection to home industries, however, assumes, as I have said, the separate and independent existence of this country under a free form of government, and the necessity, in order to preserve this form of government, that we should be able to produce by our own labor and capital whatever is necessary to make us in peace and war free from dependence upon any other government different from ours or hostile to the existence of a free government.

The true policy, it seems to me, therefore, is to adapt the legislation of this country to the fact that the material interests of different nations are not the same, and the further fact that other nations, without regard to this country, pursue that policy in this respect which they think will best promote their own interests; and we shall be wise if as to them we pursue the policy which will best promote the interests of our own country. The time has not yet arrived when the ideas of free trade will either promote the interest of other nations or the interests of this Republic. In any legislation it will be wise to adapt it to things as we find them, and not to base it upon what we think they ought to be.

The revenue raised by duties imposed upon foreign products which come in competition with home industries is as just and equal as any tax which is imposed to raise the revenue which is required to meet the expenses of the Government.

Indeed, as an indirect tax, in the place of a direct tax, it is more acceptable to the people, and therefore is the true mode of raising the revenue, so as to reduce the amount required to make up any deficiency by a tax upon specific industries.

Whoever asserts that these duties on foreign products which come in competition with home products of a like kind are bounties to those who are engaged in their manufacture and a wrong and injustice to the consumer in the increased price that is required for their purchase understands neither the purpose nor the effect of the protective principle.

Its purpose is merely to secure a fair competition against the cheap labor and capital of foreign countries, and when this is secured merely to sustain this reasonable competition between the home and the foreign product.

Its result is to invite capital to develop the industries and employ the labor of the country, and in this way to increase the supply of the article produced, and by a reasonable competition with the foreign product ultimately to reduce the price and not leave the article to the monopoly of other countries, and thus to allow such price as such monopoly may demand. Its direct tendency in this way is to reduce the price, as has been established in many cases where the protection has been given to the industries in this country.

In addition to this every industry thus protected secures a home market for other products of the soil and the mines, diversifies the industries of the country, and to the extent that we can compete with other nations makes us independent of them alike in peace and war.

With respect to the benefits which the protective policy has conferred in inviting capital, in the employ of labor, in the increase of the supply, and especially in the reduction of prices and in securing a home market, let me state some facts which will not be disputed.

The duty upon cotton of 3 cents a pound from 1789 to 1796 has resulted in securing to this country the world as the market of this product. So that since that time, with great advantage to the cotton-growing States, they have supplied not only the home market but the markets of the world with this staple, and now to a large extent hold all these markets. Indeed, from this policy of protection it has been proclaimed that even in a free government cotton had become king and could control the destinies of this country in any move which its producers desired to make.

Where would this industry have been but for the protection which was given to it in its infancy?

As with the raw material, so with the article manufactured from this staple. It had its first start in the State which I have the honor to represent, and within five miles from my residence. This industry commenced about the same time that the duty on cotton, to which I have referred, was made. Since then, under the wise policy of the Government, it has been to some extent protected; and now, in the coarser cotton goods there is perhaps no need of but small protection.

The finer goods still need the protection which has heretofore been bestowed upon the coarser materials, and if this policy as to them shall be retained they will, as the coarser fabrics, be produced in this country as cheap as in any other country of the world. Under this principle of protection every article of manufactured cotton has been reduced in price. And what is true of cottons is also true of woolens, which have been reduced in price at least one-half within the last thirty years.

And so of the manufactures of iron, which have been reduced in price to the extent that now five-sixths are of American manufacture.

Sewing-machines, implements of agriculture, and steam-engines are wholly of American manufacture, and the cheapest and best in the world.

The shoe industry exhibits the same result, and so through almost the entire list of home industries.

The result of applying the principle of protection to develop the industries of the country in its effect upon prices is seen in every industry which has been reasonably protected. One instance will illustrate all these industries.

The article of sheetings in 1816 was 30 cents a yard. This article includes that of shirtings. It is now less than 7 cents a yard. If now 10 cents, and in fact it is only about half that amount, it would show a difference of 20 cents a yard in price.

At an average of only 4 yards to each person, the State of Illinois, with a population of 2,539,891, would, by this decrease in price of only one article of industry, receive annually a benefit equal to $2,031,918; Indiana, with a population of 1,680,637, a benefit annually of $1,344,809; Missouri, with a population of 1,721,295, a benefit of $1,377,036; Kentucky, with a population of 1,325,000, $1,056,800; New York, with a population of 4,328,710, over $4,000,000; Virginia, with a population of 1,225,163, $980,130.40; North Carolina, with a population of 1,071,861, $857,088.80; Ohio, with a population of 2,665,260, $2,132,208; Georgia, with a population of 1,184,109, $947,287.20; Louisiana, with a population of 726,915, $581,532; and so, in proportion to population, all the other States and Territories within the limits of the country.

And what is true of the cotton manufactures in the effect of the protective policy in reducing the price, is also true, to some extent, of every other industry which has been encouraged and developed by the protective policy which has been adopted by the legislation of this country.

It is true that the reduced price of the industries which have received the benefit of the protective principle is attributable, in part, to the improvements which have been made in machinery. These improvements have been made to a large extent in this country, and never would have been made but for the encouragement given by legislation in the infancy of these industries. The cotton-gin was no doubt an element which aided in securing the markets of the world for cotton; and so the improvements in machinery have aided in reducing the price of the products of all these industries; but it was the protection given by legislation in the first instance to these industries which gave them the start, and was the incentive to the inventions by which the supply was increased and the price reduced; and without it these industries would have been in the control of other nations, and the prices would have been determined by the demand made by foreign countries having the control of the supply required in this country.

The amount which has been saved by this policy it is impossible to estimate.

Who, then, are the pensioners, and who receive the bounties which members of this House complain of as received by those whose industries are protected against competition, by reasonable discrimination in favor of home industries? In truth, the protection to these industries is a mutual benefit to the whole people, and no one familiar with the industries of the country will pretend that such is not the the effect of giving protection to home industries. Heretofore these industries have only obtained a fair and reasonable profit upon the capital invested. Within several years past it has been difficult for them to obtain any profit at all. This is true of the great industries of New England, whether of cotton or woolen. These mills are now in operation, not for profit, but because it is better upon the whole to keep the machinery in motion and to retain the labor.

That either of the great industries, cotton or woolen, except cotton of the coarser qualities, will stand any further competition with foreign cotton and woolen goods is impossible. No change, therefore, should be made which will be prejudicial to these great industries. And no change affecting any of the industries of the country ought to be made, unless upon the most reliable information that they can live under the change proposed to be made.

The true policy of this Government is to look after and protect its own industries. In this way labor may be employed and capital will be invested and the resources of the country will be developed. And no change in the law ought to be made which affects any home industries, unless upon the most accurate and reliable information.

It is impossible for any committee of this House to know how any of these industries may be affected by any change in the existing law unless by obtaining that knowledge from some one who is engaged in the industry.

Before any change is made in the existing laws in relation to the duties upon articles of foreign production which come in competition with the home production, the most accurate information ought to be obtained from those who have the knowledge. It is only such a person who can give any reliable information. He knows exactly how any change will affect his own industry. And if any change is made in the law it ought to be only upon such information. The advocates of this bill make no pretense that its provisions are based upon such information. The committee from which it has been reported are gentlemen of great intelligence and information, but I venture to say have not the accurate knowledge which is required to know the effect of the changes which they propose, and without other information than they have received would not be able to determine exactly how the changes which they propose will affect the industries to which such changes apply.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be wise for Congress upon a question which affects all the industries of the country to heed the request which has come from all parts of the country and representing every industry to appoint a commission to examine the question of the tariff, and to take no action upon this subject until the report of such a commission shall have been made. Upon such a report Congress could act intelligently and in making changes in the existing law would not run the risk of destroying the great industries of the country.

Mr. WARD. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks upon this bill.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KELLEY. I ask general consent that any member of the House have leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks upon this bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. WOOD moved that the committee rise. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 119. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. WOOD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOOD and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 83, noes 111.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the first reading of the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. EDEN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. That has been done uniformly.

Mr. WOOD. The bill is not before the committee, and the rules of the House require its reading.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is the simple fact that the bill was read all through.

Mr. KELLEY. The reading of the bill was dispensed with before the debate began.

Mr. WOOD. The bill was not read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to know if it is not the right of any member of this House to call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Not after it is dispensed with.

Mr. WOOD. Gentlemen do not know what the bill is and yet they desire to dispense with its reading.

Mr. SAYLER. The first reading of the bill has been dispensed with.

Mr. KELLEY. The bill has been discussed by the chairman of the committee even after the reading of the bill has been dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will take their seats and preserve order.

Mr. CLYMER. I should like to state for the information of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear no gentleman until all gentlemen have resumed their seats and order is restored. [After a pause.] The Chair is informed that the RECORD shows that the first reading of the bill was not dispensed with.

Mr. KELLEY. Then let the bill be read for information.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I move it be read by sections.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the reading of the whole bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has hardly read it himself.

Mr. KELLEY. I read it more thoroughly than the chairman.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER, (interrupting.) I desire to move a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order. The reading of the bill has commenced under the order of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Under what order of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the committee and the rule of the House, which require that the bill be read. The reading has commenced.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman cannot interrupt the reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair that it is not in order now to move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Michigan has no right to appeal from the decision of the Chair while the bill is being read.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WOOD. All this is out of order. No debate is in order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] knows that as well as any gentleman in the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to know who presides over the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. In Committee of the Whole there is no appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG, (interrupting.) I call for order. The confusion is such that we cannot hear the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. We lose a great many points in it on account of the noise.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will come to order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) It is impossible on account of the confusion prevailing to hear one tenth of what is being read.

Mr. FINLEY. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to make a proposition. Suppose at twelve o'clock to-morrow, by general consent, we go into Committee of the Whole and take a vote on striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. HAYES. That is a fair proposition.

Mr. WOOD. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts I would make this suggestion: I do not desire to permit this bill to stand in the way of the other legislative measures before the House. If the House does not wish to consider the bill at all at this session I am entirely willing that the House shall have an opportunity of so declaring by a fair, manly, square vote taken by yeas and nays. But I am unwilling that in Committee of the Whole, where there is no record made of a man's vote, the measure should be defeated in this stealthy, unusual, and improper manner.

Mr. KELLEY. I protest against the language of the gentleman that there is anything stealthy or improper in the treatment accorded to this bill.

Mr. WOOD. Just one moment more. I desire to say to the opponents of this bill that I shall resist by every parliamentary strategy I know anything about any attempt on their part to do what they have threatened to do to-day.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then read on.

Mr. WOOD. But I am quite willing to have the sense of the House tested in the House by a yea-and-nay vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any motion submitted for the consideration of the committee?

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest that the only way to get a yea-and-nay vote on this matter is the way I have suggested. Let it be arranged now that to-morrow at twelve o'clock we shall go into the Committee of the Whole. There let a motion be made to strike out the enacting clause. If that is carried the committee will have to rise, the chairman will report the fact to the House, and the question will be submitted to the House on concurring or non-concurring by a yea-and-nay vote in the report of the committee. That is the way to reach it. Or, we could take the vote in committee to-night with the agreement that the yea-and-nay vote should be taken to-morrow.

Mr. WOOD. One-third of our side of the House is now absent.

Mr. BUTLER. They can be here by twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SPARKS. Why not vote on the bill without striking out the enacting clause? Let the committee rise and let there be a square vote in the House.

Mr. BUTLER. You cannot do that. You have to vote in Committee of the Whole first.

Mr. WOOD. I care not how the object is reached, whether in the way suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts or not. All I desire is a fair, square, manly vote on this bill. I do not care how that result is reached, so that it is reached in such a way that every man can be placed on the record on his individual responsibility for the vote he gives.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say one word. The only way to have a fair and square vote by yeas and nays on this bill is to go into Committee of the Whole and take a vote on striking out the enacting clause. If that is done then the committee immediately rises, reports that action to the House; and the question is, yea or nay, will the House concur in that action of the committee? If the House refuses to concur, then we go back immediately into Committee of the Whole on the bill. If the House concurs, the bill is dead. And upon that we can take a yea-and-nay vote.

I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that by unanimous consent we may agree by a pro forma vote to-night to strike out the enacting clause, committing nobody, with the understanding that at twelve o'clock to-morrow we shall have a vote in the House.

Mr. WOOD. I cannot consent to any vote to-night. I am perfectly willing in other respects to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as he has now stated it: that to-morrow at twelve o'clock we go into Committee of the Whole; that a motion shall then be made to strike out the enacting clause, the further reading of the bill being waived; and that if that shall prevail the committee shall rise and report the fact to the House, and then the question shall come up.

There are two modes in which the question can be determined: one by reference of the bill back to the Committee of Ways and Means and the other by a vote upon concurring in the action of the Committee of the Whole. I am perfectly willing to take the sense of the House by yeas and nays upon the proposition at an hour to be set.

Mr. BANKS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. GARFIELD. With that understanding, let the gentleman move that the committee now rise.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to obtain the consent of this committee to the proposition.

Mr. PRICE. Is the hour fixed for the vote to-morrow?

Mr. BANKS. Is there any objection to the proposed arrangement?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask if there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as accepted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. EDEN. We can carry it out any way.

Mr. WOOD. I am satisfied that the arrangement can be carried out. If the committee will now rise, I pledge myself and my friends to carry out the arrangement. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TUCKER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4106) to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks in reply to the speeches which have been made upon the tariff bill to-day.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the Senate of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 134) making further appropriations for continuing the improvement of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas.

PROFESSOR JOSEPH HENRY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the services of Professor Henry on the Light-House Board and recommending compensation for said services; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of May 27, 1878, calling for the number of male employés in that Department employed in this city and also a list of all persons in the Department who were honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

CORPUS CHRISTI, SANTIAGO AND RIO GRANDE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the Corpus Christi, Santiago and Rio Grande Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

DETROIT ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending a change in the act for disposing of the Detroit arsenal premises, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. FINLEY. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. Is not my motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The remedy of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is to vote down the motion to adjourn. The Chair desires to state that by agreement the session of to-night was set apart for the consideration of the Mexican award bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there to be anything but discussion to-night?

The SPEAKER. The session is for the consideration of the Mexican award bill.

Mr. KENNA. If there shall not happen to be a quorum present, there can be no consideration of the bill if the question of a quorum be raised.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 65, noes 63.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. KENNA called for tellers.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to have it understood that there is to be no final vote on the bill to-night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the order to be read, so that the House will understand exactly what it is.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. We are willing that to-night shall be devoted to the discussion of the bill without any action upon it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the Journal; there should be no controversy about the matter.

Mr. FINLEY. If that is agreed to, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not competent for the House at this time to determine that no vote shall be taken to-night?

Mr. PRICE. It is understood that no business is to be transacted to-night except the consideration of the Mexican award bill.

The SPEAKER. That is already the order of the House.

Mr. WAIT. If it is understood that there is to be no vote to-night, I think there will be no objection to a night session.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the order of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That an evening session be held on Tuesday evening, June 4, commencing at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., for the consideration of the bill of the House No. 2117, to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, said bill to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The session this evening is for the consideration of the bill named; that will bring the bill up for action.

Mr. WILSON. I am quite willing that the session to-night shall be for debate only upon the bill, and that the vote shall be taken upon the bill to-morrow.

Mr. PRICE. No other business to be transacted to-night.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would inquire if the bill for consideration to-night is the one reported from the Senate. I wish it to be understood that a part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs antagonize certain views held by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] on this subject.

Mr. WILSON. The House bill is on the public Calendar. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia now makes a proposition that we have an evening session to be held——

Mr. HAMILTON. I wish it understood that I antagonize the bill.

Mr. WILSON. My colleague on the committee was for the bill a day or two ago in the committee, but is now against it.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr HAMILTON] will have the right to "antagonize the bill" if he wants to.

Mr. COOK. Can we not give these gentlemen the privilege of printing what they have to say, so as to dispense with an evening session?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia now makes a proposition that an evening session be held, to commence at seven o'clock and thirty minutes; that it shall be for debate only on the Mexican award bill, no other business whatever to be transacted; and further that the vote be taken to-morrow. When?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WILSON. At twelve o'clock.

A MEMBER. We vote then on the tariff bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Let this come up after the tariff bill is disposed of.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. EATON.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 1200) to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. I renew the motion.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. COVERT as Speaker pro tempore.

MEXICAN AWARD BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By the previous direction of the House the session this evening is for debate only on the bill (S. No. 1016) to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to receive any and all moneys which may be paid by the Mexican Republic under and in pursuance of the conventions between the United States and the Mexican Republic for the adjustment of claims, concluded July 4, 1868, and April 29, 1876; and whenever and as often as any installments shall have been paid by the Mexican Republic, on account of said awards, to distribute the moneys so received in ratable proportions among the corporations, companies, or private individuals respectively in whose favor awards have been made by said commissioners, or by the umpires, or to their legal representatives or assigns, except as is in this act otherwise limited or provided, according to the proportion which their respective awards shall bear to the whole amount of such moneys then held by him, and to pay the same, without other charge or deduction than is hereinafter provided, to the parties respectively entitled thereto. And in making such distribution and payment, due regard shall be had to the value at the time of such distribution of the respective currencies in which the said awards are made payable; and the proportionate amount of any award of which by its terms the United States is entitled to retain a part shall be deducted from the payment to be made on such award, and shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the unappropriated money in the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Secretary of State of the United States, in gold or its equivalent, the equivalent of $56,528.57 in Mexican gold dollars, and $10,559.67 in American gold coin, and $89,410.17 in United States currency, said sums being the aggregate in said currencies respectively of the awards made under the said convention of July 4, 1868, in favor of citizens of the Mexican Republic against the United States, and having been deducted from the amount awarded in favor of citizens of the United States, and payable by Mexico, in accordance with article 4 of the said treaty; and that said sums, when paid to the Secretary of State, as aforesaid, shall be regarded as part of the awards made under the said treaty, to be paid or distributed as herein provided.

SEC. 3. That out of the payments and installments received from Mexico, as aforesaid, on account of said awards, and out of the moneys which shall be received by the Secretary of State under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of State shall, when and as the same shall be received and paid, and before any payment to claimants, deduct therefrom and retain a sum not to exceed 5 per cent. of said moneys awarded to citizens of the United States, until the aggregate of the amounts so deducted and retained shall equal the sum of $114,948.74, being the amount of the expenses of the commission, including contingent expenses paid by the United States in accordance with article 6 of the treaty, as ascertained and determined in pursuance of the provisions of the said treaty; which said sums, when and as the same are deducted and retained, shall be, by the Secretary of State, transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury and passed to the account of and be regarded as unappropriated money in the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That in the payment of money, in virtue of this act, to any corporation, company, or private individual, the Secretary of State shall first deduct and retain or make reservation of such sums of money, if any, as may be due to the United States from any corporation, company, or private individual in whose favor awards shall have been made under the said convention.

SEC. 5. That the awards made in the case of Benjamin Weil and in the case of La Abra Silver Mining Company shall not, nor shall any part thereof, be paid, except as in this section provided. The President of the United States shall, within six months next after the passage of this act, consider and determine, upon such evidence and information as he shall deem just, whether there is probable cause to believe that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity require that said awards, or either of them, shall be opened or set aside, or a new trial be had in respect of the validity or justice of the respective claims on which they are founded; and if the President shall so determine, the award or awards so determined upon shall not be paid over by the Government of the United States to said claimants, and shall be suspended to await such action in respect thereto as the two governments may, in due course, agree upon, or the Government of the United States may determine. But if the President shall not so determine as aforesaid within said six months, then the award or awards aforesaid not so determined upon shall be paid in the manner and proportions provided for the other awards in this act mentioned.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend this bill of the Senate by striking out the fifth section and inserting the fifth section of the House bill on the same subject.

The section proposed to be inserted as a substitute for section 5 was read, as follows:

That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as precluding the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, upon application by the Mexican government, from the consideration of any particular claim or claims wherein awards against Mexico have been made, nor from the investigation of any alleged frauds or perjury materially affecting said particular awards, nor from suspending payment of the amounts of such particular claims pending any such negotiations between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House bill No. 39, having had the same under consideration, directed me to report it back to the House with an adverse recommendation, and as a substitute therefor to report House bill No. 2117 with the recommendation that it do pass. The resolution to which I have just referred is as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to suspending payment of the claims of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and the La Abra Silver Mining Company, No. 489, on the American docket of the late joint commission of the United States and Mexico.

Whereas the Mexican government has charged and offers to prove that the claims of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and the La Abra Silver Mining Company, No. 489, on the American docket of the late joint commission of the United States and Mexico, are based upon fraud and perjury; and

Whereas international courtesy and justice toward Mexico require that the payment of said claims should be suspended, as payment of the Venezuelan awards was suspended, until an investigation can be had of said charges, to the end that the United States may not involuntarily be made a party to fraud upon a friendly nation: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to pay no moneys on account of said two claims until further information is obtained by Congress.

I shall not detain the House with having read in detail the first four sections of the bill reported. They provide for the distribution of the money paid and to be paid by the Republic of Mexico in pursuance of the awards rendered by the joint commission created by a treaty between that government and this on the 4th of July, 1868, which was duly proclaimed in the year 1869. The object of the fifth section of the bill is to disclaim any idea upon the part of Congress of precluding the President from a proper consideration of the allegation of fraud preferred by Mexico against the Weil and La Abra claims. These claimants were American citizens, and the findings in their favor amounted to over a million of dollars.

I now ask, Mr. Speaker, the Clerk to read the following extracts from the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 4th day of July, 1868, the President of the United States of America and the President of the Republic of Mexico, for the purpose of settling various claims and complaints that had been made by citizens of each of those republics against the other, and with a view to maintain and increase the friendly feeling existing between the two countries, concluded a treaty (c, p. 11,) which was duly proclaimed on the 1st day of February, 1869. That treaty provided that one commissioner should be appointed by the President of the United States and one commissioner by the President of the Republic of Mexico; that those commissioners should meet at Washington, and, after making and subscribing a solemn declaration that they would examine carefully, and decide, to the best of their judgments, according to public law, justice, and equity, the claims and complaints aforesaid, should name a third person to act as umpire, in case of disagreement between them. The treaty prescribed rules and regulations for the government of the commissioners and umpire, and required them to conclude their duties within two years and six months of the first meeting of the commission; that is to say, before the 31st day of January, 1872.

A conclusion of all the cases laid before the umpire was reached before the last day allowed him by the treaty of April 29, 1876, to wit, the 20th day of November, 1876, (f, page 14.)

The final account of this "joint claims commission," as signed by Mr. Secretary Fish and Señor Ignacio Mariscal, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Mexico to the United States, (g, page 19,) shows that $4,125,622.20 were awarded against Mexico and in favor of citizens of the United States, and $150,498.41 were awarded against the United States and in favor of citizens of Mexico.

* * * * * * *

Accordingly, on the 31st day of January, 1877, the Republic of Mexico paid to the State Department of the United States the sum of $300,000, less a balance of $57,000 against the United States on account of the expenses of the commission.

The object of the resolution referred to this committee is to suspend the payment of money under two of the awards of Sir Edward Thornton, one in favor of Benjamin Weil, and numbered by the commission 447; the other in favor of the La Abra Mining Company, and numbered 489, on the ground that they are "based on fraud and perjury."

* * * * * * *

Upon an examination of the records of the State Department, the committee ascertained that motions were made by the Mexican agent for rehearing the awards in the La Abra and Weil claims, on the 20th day of January, 1876, and that those motions were formally denied by the declarations of the umpire dated the 20th day of October, 1876, (j, page 25.)

Hon. William M. Evarts, the present Secretary of State, in a letter of the date of November 6, 1877, to Hon. THOMAS SWANN, chairman of this committee, (the letter referred to the committee,) speaking of the above-mentioned bill, used the following language:

"The final passage of the bill in the Senate was arrested, in the last days of the session, by a suggestion that evidence might be presented that two of the awards were based upon fraudulent testimony, and that some delay should be allowed for that reason.

"Since that time the Mexican government has simply presented, in a pamphlet form, the motions made for a hearing before the umpire (Sir Edward Thornton) in the cases of Benjamin Weil and of La Abra Mining Company, adding thereto the correspondence between the Mexican minister, Don Ignacio Mariscal, and my predecessor, Mr. Fish, in reference to these two cases. These motions were denied by the umpire, and these awards, standing upon the same footing of finality under the convention with all the others, are awaiting distribution.

"In a communication accompanying these pamphlets, Señor Cuellar, the Mexican chargé d'affaires ad interim, states that the object of this appeal of his government is 'not to prevent the payment of the awards made by the umpire in the now extinct mixed claims commission, but only in the interest of rectitude and justice, to render manifest the fraud committed by the parties interested.'" (Ib. page 28.)

The above is a general history of the subject-matter referred to this committee.

JURISDICTION.

The grave and all-important question naturally arises, How far, if at all, the House of Representatives can take cognizance of that subject-matter? Is it within the jurisdiction of the House to grant the relief asked for Mexico or is this a question wholly within the jurisdiction of the Executive?

By the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States the power to make treaties is conferred upon the President, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present at the time of voting; and treaties so made are, by the sixth article of the Constitution, declared to be the supreme law of the land.

* * * * * * *

The committee are of the opinion that the House of Representatives has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter referred by the joint resolution, and that the Mexican Republic has not made, and could not properly make, any application to the legislative department of this Government.

SUPPOSING JURISDICTION TO EXIST.

But upon the theory that the House of Representatives has jurisdiction over the subject, is the case presented, upon the record of proceedings, without considering any evidence not before the commission, one in which that jurisdiction should be exercised?

The treaty was duly proclaimed; commissioners and arbitrators were appointed, claims presented; evidence was offered; cases were regularly heard and finally disposed of. The result having been attained, motions were made by the agent of Mexico to rehear the Weil and La Abra cases. These motions were by the umpire overruled.

* * * * * * *

After the awards in these two cases had been proclaimed the treaty of the 29th day of April, 1876, recognizing the finality of all the awards made up to that date, including these, was concluded, and by the protocol of a still later date the finality of the awards was again recognized, the amount of the expenses of the joint commission was stated, and its payment provided for.

Awards of umpires acting under treaties between sovereigns may be surcharged and falsified.

It is not pretended that the two awards in question come within the scope of the authority just cited; on the contrary, no fraud is imputed to Sir Edward Thornton. The committee report with pleasure, from all the lights before them, that he performed the vast labor assigned to him with honor to himself and justice toward the parties, and in accordance with the proofs presented to him.

Viewing the subject in the light of the foregoing, the committee are of the opinion that Mexico is entitled to no relief at the hands of Congress.

It will be observed by reference to the letter of Señor Avila, as also to the diplomatic letter of Señor Mariscal to Secretary Fish, that they disclaim any intention of putting in doubt the final and conclusive character of the above-mentioned awards, and that the only purpose was to appeal to the sense of justice and equity of the United States upon their theory that the awards had been obtained by perjury; and even Señor Vallarta disclaims all purpose to begin and maintain a controversy over the decisions of the umpire.

RECOMMENDATIONS BY THE COMMITTEE.

The committee are of the opinion that the appropriation recommended by Secretaries Fish and Evarts should now be made; but are of the opinion, further, that, as questions of large importance and benefit to the United States were settled by the commission, the $114,948.78 should not be paid altogether out of the first installment from Mexico, but should be paid by pro rata deductions, at the rate of not more than 5 per cent. from all the payments by Mexico as they shall be made; and it is proper to remark that this feature of the bill meets the views of Secretary Evarts. The committee submit with this report a bill to carry out the objects of the treaty, and recommend its passage.

They report back the joint resolution referred to them with an adverse recommendation.

The committee do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the questions of fraud and perjury suggested by the representatives of Mexico, nor as saying that any application which has been or may be made by Mexico to the executive department of this Government should not be entertained by it, or that the relief sought should not be granted. It is the opinion of the committee that the question presented, in so far as it relates to the payment of money under the awards received from Mexico, is entirely within the jurisdiction and discretion of the treaty-making power under the Constitution, and that the Executive is, with the concurrence of the Senate, fully empowered to open negotiations with Mexico by further treaty, if the two powers can concur therein, to accomplish the relief asked for; and if, in the opinion of the President, such frauds have been practiced as to entitle Mexico to relief, this committee would be gratified to know that proper steps would be taken to that end.

Mr. WILSON. This report, extracts of which have just been read by the Clerk, explains so fully the views of the committee that it is unnecessary for me to detain the House for the purpose of repeating what is there better said than I can say it.

The committee were of opinion that the question presented to this House belonged purely and exclusively to the executive department of the Government. It will be remembered that under the Articles of Confederation the treaty-making power was conferred upon the popular branch of Congress; but by the convention that framed our present Constitution that power was expressly withheld from that branch and was conferred upon the executive department, and with the view that there might be no abuse of that power the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting was required to ratify any treaty. I can best explain the law on this subject by reading from the second volume of Story on the Constitution, section 1513, page 379:

The President is the immediate author and finisher of all treaties.

This power having by the express terms of the Constitution been conferred upon the President to be exercised by and with the concurrence of the Senate and expressly and directly taken from the popular branch of Congress, the committee are of the opinion that this House has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter under consideration.

THE STIPULATIONS OF THE TREATY.

By the first article of that treaty it was stipulated that one commissioner should be appointed by each government; that these commissioners should meet in the city of Washington within six months after the exchange of the ratifications; that they should take the oath therein prescribed, and should name some third person to act as umpire in any case or cases in which they should differ in opinion as to the finding. It also provided that such umpire should make and subscribe a solemn declaration in a form similar to that which was prescribed for the commissioners. It also provided for filling vacancies in the office of either commissioner or umpire, if any should occur. It further provided that these commissioners should proceed, according to the rules therein prescribed, to hear and determine all claims presented by the citizens of either government against the other between February 2, 1848, the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and the date of the treaty of the 4th of July, 1868.

The second article of the treaty under consideration provided that the commissioners should conjointly proceed to the investigation and decision of the claims which should be presented to their notice, in such manner as they might conjointly think proper, and in the event of their disagreement in any claim the same should be transmitted to the umpire; and it further stipulated that—

The President of the United States of America and the President of the Mexican Republic hereby solemnly and sincerely engage to consider the decision of the commissioners conjointly, or of the umpire, as the case may be, as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon by them or him, respectively, and to give full effect to such decisions, without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever.

The third article prescribed the time in which the claims should be presented and the time in which they should be decided by either the commissioners or the umpire.

By the fourth article of the treaty it was stipulated that the total amount awarded in all cases decided in favor of the citizens of one of the governments should be deducted from the total amount awarded to the citizens of the other government, and the balance, to the amount of $300,000, should be paid at the City of Mexico or at the city of Washington, in gold or its equivalent, within twelve months of the close of the commission, to the government in favor of whose citizens the greater amount should be awarded, without interest or other deduction than that specified in the sixth article of the treaty, the residue to be paid in annual installments to an amount not exceeding $300,000 in gold or its equivalent.

The fifth article is in these words:

The high contracting parties agree to consider the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of every claim upon either government, arising out of any transaction of a date prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention; and further engage that every such claim, whether or not the same may have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the said commission, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the said commission, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible.

The sixth article requires the commissioners and umpire to keep an accurate record and correct minutes of the proceedings of the commission, with the dates. It authorizes them to appoint secretaries versed in the language of both countries, to be paid by each government; and further provides that "the whole expense of the commission, including the contingent expenses, shall be defrayed by ratable deduction on the amount of the sums awarded by the commission, provided always that such reduction should not exceed 5 per cent. of the sum so awarded;" and that the deficiencies, if any, should be defrayed in moieties by the two governments.

The seventh article provides for the time and manner of the ratification of the treaty.

THE PERSONNEL OF THE TRIBUNAL.

In pursuance of this treaty, which was duly ratified and proclaimed, on April 22, 1869, Mr. William Henry Wadsworth was appointed the commissioner on the part of the United States, and on June 3, 1869, Señor Don Francisco Gomez Palacio was appointed commissioner on the part of Mexico. On the 10th of April, 1872, Señor Palacio was succeeded by Señor Leon Guzman, who took his seat as commissioner on the 24th of June, 1872. On the 5th of May he in turn was succeeded by Señor Don Manuel Maria de Zamacona, who entered upon the discharge of his duties on the 19th of the following August. On the 10th of June, 1870, Dr. Francis Lieber was chosen umpire; but he having died, Sir Edward Thornton, the representative of the British government in the United States, was selected to succeed him. It becoming apparent that the commission could not perform the labor and decide the cases referred to it within the time specified in the treaty, that time was prolonged by various other treaties up to November 20, 1876. Within this time the final result was reached and awards rendered in favor of citizens of the United States against Mexico for $4,125,622.20 and awards rendered in favor of the citizens of Mexico against the United States for $150,498.41.

ACKNOWLEDGING THE VALIDITY OF THE RESULT.

This mixed commission having concluded its functions before November 20, 1876, the time fixed for such conclusion, Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, representing the United States, and Don Ignacio Mariscal, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican Republic, representing that republic, met at the city of Washington, December 14, 1876, and by protocol "under their respective hands," approved the same. They also, under the sixth article of the treaty, agreed upon a final settlement of the expenses of the commission.

MEXICO BEGINS TO MAKE PAYMENTS OF AWARDS.

On January 31, 1876, Mexico, in part discharge of the obligation thus imposed upon her, paid over to the United States the first installment of $300,000 in coin, less $57,499.01, which, by the stipulation of the treaty and protocol I have referred to, she was to have credit for as being the amount paid on expenses of the commission in excess of the ratable deduction from the amount awarded to her citizens against the United States.

This item of expenses I will more fully explain when I state the provisions of the bill reported by the committee.

"OBJECTION, EVASION, OR DELAY."

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the facts I have stated, after the labors of the commission have been concluded, the result of those labors approved by the representatives of the two governments, and the first installment paid over by Mexico, in due observance of the requirements of the treaty, we are confronted by the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Thus it will be seen that this House is asked to direct the Treasurer of the United States to pay no money on account of the awards in the Weil and La Abra claims for the reason as stated that they were based on fraud and perjury. I will discuss the law of the case first as upon a demurrer, and the facts afterward.

WHAT JURISDICTION HAS THE HOUSE IN THIS MATTER?

And that brings us to the grave inquiry as to what authority this House has for taking any action at all in the matter—what jurisdiction has it over the subject?

ABOUT THE TREATY-MAKING POWER.

The convention between the governments was ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the president of the Mexican Republic, with the approbation of the congress of that republic. And by the last clause of the second article of the treaty the two high contracting parties mutually, solemnly, and sincerely agreed to consider the decision of the commissioners conjointly, or of the umpire, as the case might be, as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon, and to give full effect to such decision without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever.

Before proceeding to discuss the question of the jurisdiction of this House, it is proper to look to the nature and character of that treaty. It was an international agreement duly executed and proclaimed by the two countries, creating a mixed commission with full power to consider and decide the claims specified in the treaty. It provided for the manner of the organization of that tribunal, laid down the rules for its proceedings, specified the time in which it should conclude its labors, and provided that its decisions should be absolutely final and conclusive.

The power of the President to enter into such a treaty is derived from the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

And by the sixth article of the Constitution such treaties when made "shall be the supreme law of the land."

Story, in his work on the Constitution, volume 2, book 3, page 379, section 1513, third edition, says:

The President is the immediate author and finisher of all treaties; and all the advantages which can be derived from talents, information, integrity, and deliberate investigation on the one hand, and from secrecy and dispatch on the other, are thus combined in the system. But no treaty so formed becomes binding upon the country unless it receives the deliberate assent of two-thirds of the Senate.

No question has been presented, and none will be, as to the power of the President, by and with the concurrence of the Senate, to execute this treaty, nor of the power of the mixed commission to exercise the functions they have exercised under it.

The various subjects upon which Congress has power to legislate are enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution:

ENUMERATED POWERS.

To collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay debts, provide for common defense and general welfare;
To borrow money;
To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;
To establish uniform rules of naturalization and bankruptcies;
To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix standard of weights and measures;
To provide for punishing counterfeiting;
To promote the progress of science and the useful arts;
To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;
To define and punish piracies and felonies;
To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures;
To raise and support armies;
To provide and maintain a navy;
To make rules for land and naval forces;
To provide for calling forth the militia, and for organizing, arming and disciplining the same;
To exercise exclusive legislation over the seat of Government;
To make all laws necessary and proper for executing the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or offices thereof.

THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF THE TREATY.

Mr. Speaker, a careful and critical examination of those enumerated powers will satisfy any intelligent man that the subject of this treaty and the proposition submitted by the joint resolution now under consideration are not embraced among those powers, and that, as a consequence, Congress has no power to legislate thereon.

The Constitution imposes no limit as to the subjects upon which the President and Senate, as the treaty-making power, may act.

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION.

Now, if the subject of a treaty be one of those to which Congress is limited, there is in the particular case a concurrent jurisdiction between Congress and the treaty-making power. Where such concurrent jurisdiction exists, Congress may abrogate a treaty by an act. But there is a limit upon Congress as to the subjects touching which it may legislate.

LEGAL AUTHORITIES ON THE QUESTION OF JURISDICTION.

I have asserted that this House cannot interfere with or obstruct the execution of this treaty unless the power to legislate upon the subject-matter of it has been delegated to Congress by the Federal Constitution. To sustain this position, I read from the case of Taylor vs. Morton, 2 Curtis, C. C., 454.

The question presented in that case was this: the plaintiff by his action of assumpsit sought to recover back from the collector of customs at the port of Boston moneys alleged to have been illegally exacted and collected from him upon hemp imported by him from Russia. He claimed, and the fact was not controverted, that by the treaty of 1832 between this country and Russia, when considered in connection with other treaties to which it related, the duty on such hemp was only $25 per ton. The collector replied the tariff act passed by Congress in 1842 by which a duty of $40 per ton was imposed on the hemp so imported, and that this amount had been paid by the plaintiff. For the plaintiff it was claimed that the treaty was the supreme law of the land, and that the act of Congress in question could not and did not abrogate it. The court held, however, that the act of Congress being subsequent in point of time to the treaty and the subject-matter being within the legislative power of Congress under the constitutional provision above quoted, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," was constitutional and did abrogate the treaty. The court says:

Though a treaty is the law of the land under the Constitution of the United States, Congress may repeal it so far as it is a municipal law, provided its subject-matter is within the legislative power of Congress.

The inference is that if the subject-matter was not within the legislative power of Congress it could not act. I have attempted to show that the subject under consideration is not within the legislative power of Congress.

This decision is in full accord with the opinion I have expressed upon the subject in question. Congress and the treaty-making power had concurrent jurisdiction and it was competent for either to act, and the last act was the controlling one.

And the same is true of what is known as the Cherokee tobacco case, 11 Wallace, 616.

A treaty had been made with the Cherokee Indians, pursuant to which their products were not to be taxed that were sold by them inside their Territory.

The internal-revenue law was passed in terms broad enough to cover this Territory, and it was held that this abrogated the treaty. This is a case exactly like the other, decided upon precisely the same principle, namely, that Congress was acting within its legislative authority, for the Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to levy taxes; and Taylor vs. Morton is the authority upon which it was decided.

The Clinton bridge case, in 1 Walworth, is another of the same kind, and decided upon exactly the same principle.

In further support of this position, I read from Abbott's National Digest, volume 5, page 470:

Notwithstanding that treaties are declared by the Constitution to be a part of the supreme law, yet an act of Congress passed subsequent to a treaty may have the effect of abrogating it. The act is not necessarily void or ineffective because inconsistent with a prior treaty. If the subject-matter of the act is within the constitutional power of Congress, the courts must enforce the enactment as the latest expression of the legislative will, and leave the question of international obligations arising out of the infraction of the treaty to be settled by the executive department.

The same doctrine is laid down in 2 Brightly's Digest, in the following language:

Though a treaty be the law of the land, yet, so far as it is a municipal law, Congress may abrogate it; provided its subject-matter be within the legislative power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that all the authorities to which I have referred predicate the right of Congress to interfere with the execution of a treaty or to abrogate it, upon the ground that the subject-matter is within its legislative power.

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

Concerning this matter there is an interesting page in the history of this country to which I desire to call the attention of this House. It is the opinion of George Washington on this subject; the opinion of the president of the convention that framed the Constitution; the opinion of the patriot and statesman whom the people of the United States called to preside over the nation during the first two presidential terms.

On the 14th day of March, 1796, the House of Representatives by resolution requested President Washington to lay before it certain papers touching a treaty with the King of Great Britain, if not incompatible, &c. In his message in response to that resolution the President said:

Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject, and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion, that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward becomes the law of the land.

* * * * * * *

In those journals (those of the general convention) it will appear that a proposition was made "that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law," and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

* * * * * * *

And as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different Departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office under all the circumstances of this case forbid a compliance with your request.

G. WASHINGTON.

Under the Articles of Confederation Congress possessed the sole power of entering into treaties and alliances with foreign nations; but our experience during the existence of the confederation demonstrated that the exercise of that power by Congress would involve the country in endless difficulties and dangers. It was for this reason that the framers of the Constitution deliberately took it away from Congress. They conferred it upon two branches of the Government whose use of it has abundantly shown the wisdom of the change.

MESSAGE OF ANDREW JACKSON.

At a still later date in the history of the country another distinguished President, Andrew Jackson, in 1833, in sustaining the prerogatives of the Executive and resisting encroachments by Congress in an interference with the removal of the deposits of public moneys from the Bank of the United States, and to keep up the boundary line between the several co-ordinate departments of the Government, by his special message said:

The Executive is a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government, equally with the Senate, and I have yet to learn under what constitutional authority that branch of the Legislature has a right to require of me an account or any communication, either verbally or in writing, made to the heads of Departments, acting as a cabinet council. As well might I be required to detail to the Senate the free and private conversations I have held with those officers on any subjects relating to their duties and my own. * * * I am constrained, therefore, by a proper sense of my own self-respect, and of the rights secured by the Constitution to the executive branch of the Government, to decline a compliance with your request.

ANDREW JACKSON.

From what I have said and the authorities I have quoted it must be apparent Congress has no authority by legislation to obstruct the payment of these two awards; that Congress has no power to break down or override the result of this treaty except indirectly by a declaration of war.

AUXILIARY LEGISLATION.

In this connection I desire to speak of another point. It is this: in cases like the one under consideration, where the jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the treaty is with the treaty-making power, auxiliary or helping legislation may become necessary to the complete carrying out of the treaty, and to that extent Congress can legislate. (Lawrence's Wheaton on International Law, page 457.)

In this instance such legislation has become necessary. As I have stated, awards were rendered against Mexico for over $4,000,000, and awards were rendered against the United States for about $150,000. Now, to pay the Mexican claimants their awards against this Government, Mexico deducts from the sum she owes us the $150,000, as she was authorized to do by the fourth article of the treaty. It therefore becomes necessary for this Government to pay out of its Treasury the sum of $150,000 to its own citizens to make up what was so taken from them to pay its indebtedness to Mexicans. This is a mere municipal matter, one in which only this Government and its own citizens are interested. Consequently there is no reason why Congress should not legislate upon it so far as it falls under the constitutional authorization of Congress touching municipal affairs.

THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS ON JURISDICTION.

But over the question presented by the joint resolution the Committee on Foreign Affairs are unanimously of the opinion that this House has no jurisdiction.

WHEN THE COMMISSION ITSELF IS TAINTED WITH FRAUD.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be understood as saying that awards of umpires acting under treaties may not be surcharged and falsified; but this can be done only in cases in which the commissioners or umpires have themselves become tainted with fraud. Nothing of that kind is charged in this case. No imputation of fraud lies at the door of Sir Edward Thornton. The committee ascertained and have reported that he performed the vast labor assigned to him in a manner honorable to himself and to the two governments for whom he was acting. Upon this question of surcharging and falsifying awards I read from Vattel's Law of Nations, by Chitty, new edition, pages 277, 278:

When sovereigns cannot agree about their pretensions, and are nevertheless desirous of preserving or restoring peace, they sometimes submit the decision of their disputes to arbitrators chosen by common agreement. When once the contending parties have entered into articles of arbitration, they are bound to abide by the sentence of the arbitrators; they have engaged to do this; and the faith of treaties should be religiously observed. If, however, the arbitrators, by pronouncing a sentence evidently unjust and unreasonable, should forfeit the character with which they were invested, their judgment would deserve no attention. The parties had appealed to it only with a view to the decision of doubtful questions.

This authority, Mr. Speaker, puts an estoppel on Mexico in her false clamor here. She is bound by the awards unless she can show that the commissioners or umpire have forfeited the character with which they were invested. Nothing of the kind has been attempted.

BUT SUPPOSE THIS HOUSE HAS JURISDICTION.

But now, Mr. Speaker, upon the theory that the subject of this treaty is within "the legislative power of Congress" and that it had jurisdiction over the treaty, is the case here presented by the record—to suspend payment of these awards—one in which that jurisdiction can now be exercised? The treaty is no longer in existence. It expired by its own limitation. The decisions of its commissioners and the award of its umpire stand. They have been approved by the diplomatic representatives of the two governments, and those governments are bound by treaty obligations to give them full effect without any "objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever." Now, I ask gentlemen by what authority, international, constitutional, or statutory, Congress can defeat these awards and divert from its citizens the gold in the Treasury that has been paid for their use by Mexico? Congress may create courts and prescribe their jurisdiction and provide for appeals, but it will certainly not be contended that Congress can reverse, annul, or supersede such judgments after they have become final. These awards were made by a tribunal created by the treaty-making power in the rightful and lawful exercise of its constitutional authority, and in this case it was expressly stipulated that there should be no appeal, evasion, or delay.

Mr. Speaker, this effort to open up the consideration of these awards by Mexico is not the only application of the kind that has been presented to this House. Since the resolution alluded to was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs petitions have been presented to this House by American claimants whose claims were rejected by the commission or the umpire. They, too, want rehearings. If the wish of Mexico is to be respected, their wishes also must be respected, and the whole subject be reviewed by this House. The two thousand claims passed upon by that commission, covering transactions ranging through twenty years of time, must be reviewed by us. We are told by Mr. Ashton, the American agent, that the proof alone, now in manuscript in the Spanish and English languages, if printed, would make two hundred thousand octavo pages. It required years of diligent work by this commission to pass upon these claims, and now if that work is to be reviewed by this House no man now living can hope to see that work accomplished.

CHARACTER OF THE TWO CLAIMS IN QUESTION.

This brings me to consider for a moment the nature and character of those claims.

The claim of Weil was predicated upon the seizure by troops under the rebel Cortina of a large amount of cotton belonging to the claimant, which was being transported through Mexico destined for Matamoras.

The La Abra Silver Mining Company had purchased large and valuable silver mines in the state of Durango, Mexico, and was regularly engaged in the business of mining. In that business, in the purchase of property and the construction of the necessary improvements, the company had expended a large amount of capital, when unexpectedly the mines were seized by Mexicans, the company's movable property was spoliated, and the officers and employés insulted and persecuted, and finally driven from the country.

In his decision upon the La Abra case Sir Edward Thornton says:

LA ABRA MINING COMPANY vs. MEXICO. } No. 487.

With reference to the case of La Abra Silver Mining Company vs. Mexico, No. 489, the umpire is fully satisfied and cannot doubt that the company is entitled to be considered a corporation or company of citizens of the United States in accordance with the terms of the convention of July 4, 1868, having been duly chartered in conformity with the laws of the State of New York. He is also of opinion that the enterprise upon which the claimants entered, of purchasing, denouncing, and working certain mines in the state of Durango, in Mexico, was a serious and honest business transaction on their part, and that there was nothing rash, deceitful, or fraudulent in it, but that it was engaged in with the sole intention of carrying out legitimate mining operations.

* * * * * * *

The evidence on the part of the claimants is, in the umpire's opinion, of great weight; the witnesses are for the most part highly respectable and men of intelligence, and their testimony bears the impress of truth.

* * * * * * *

It appears that the superintendent of the mines took such steps as he could to obtain protection from these authorities, and finding his efforts in vain he appealed, through a lawyer of high character, to the highest authorities in the state, who declined to interfere in the matter.

In the Weil case he says:

The umpire considers that the facts put forward by the claimant are sufficiently proved, namely, that the cotton belonged to him; that it was seized and taken by troops belonging to the Mexican government, and under the command of General Cortina.

* * * * * * *

The umpire is therefore of opinion that the claimant was committing no illegal act in transporting his cotton through Coahuila and Tamaulipas with destination to Matamoras on the 20th of September, 1854, and that it was seized by Mexican authorities, for whatever reason it may have been seized, the Mexican government is bound to indemnify the claimant.

A PROPOSITION TO REHEAR THE CASES.

These two claims, among others, having been thus finally decided, on the application of Señor Eleuterio Avila, the attorney for Mexico, for a rehearing, Sir Edward Thornton held—

The wording of the convention of July 4, 1868, by which the commission was established, and which laid down the duties of the umpire, was to the effect that when the commissioners should fail to agree in opinion upon any individual claim, they should call to their assistance the umpire whom they may have agreed to name; and such umpire, after having examined the evidence adduced for and against the claim, and after having heard, if required, one person on each side on behalf of each government on each and every separate claim, and consulted with the commissioners, shall decide thereupon finally and without appeal.

* * * * * * *

But the umpire believes that the provisions of the convention debar him from rehearing cases on which he has already decided. By it the decisions are pronounced to be final and without appeal, and the two governments agree to consider them as absolutely final and conclusive, and to give full effect to them without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever. He believes that in view of these stipulations neither government has a right to expect that any of the claims shall be reheard.

* * * * * * *

In the case No. 489, "La Abra Mining Company vs. Mexico," the Mexican agent appeals to authorities as to the value of ores, who, he states, are at Philadelphia. Why were not the statements of these gentlemen—of whose existence the umpire was not aware, and to whom he had not access—reduced to evidence and produced before the commission?

* * * * * * *

In the case No. 447, "Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico," the agent of Mexico has produced circumstantial evidence which, if not refuted by the claimant, would certainly contribute to the suspicion that perjury has been committed, and that the whole claim is a fraud. For the reason already given, it is not in the power of the umpire to take that evidence into consideration, but if perjury shall be proved hereafter no one would rejoice more than the umpire himself that his decision should be reversed and that justice should be done.

LACHES ON MEXICO'S PART.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to note the fact that in the La Abra case the Mexican attorney pretended to rely upon what could, as he claimed, be proven by two witnesses in Philadelphia. The evidence of these witnesses was never produced, no effort was made to get them before the commissioners or the umpire, and no reason was assigned why both of these things could not be done, nor does it appear that even an affidavit was filed as to any material facts that could be proven by them. For aught that appeared before the commission or the umpire, for aught that appears to-day, those witnesses may exist only in the imagination of the Mexican attorney. And I desire the House to note another fact. That the attorney "produced circumstantial evidence before the umpire" upon the motion for a rehearing in the Weil case which contributed to the suspicion that perjury had been committed. Why was not this evidence produced before the commissioners when they were considering the claim, or produced before the umpire before he decided it? The cause of action arose in Mexican territory. It was alleged that Cortina's band had robbed Weil. The Mexican government had every facility for procuring evidence that would throw light upon the subject, and yet none is produced until after the case has been finally decided. It will not do for Mexico to say that she had no opportunity to offer proof of this alleged perjury, for it appears from the opinion of the American commissioner, Mr. Wadsworth, that at the time the Weil case was submitted to the two commissioners he distinctly proposed to give the Mexican attorney the fullest opportunity to offer any additional testimony in the Weil case; but this proposition was declined.

Mr. Speaker, I have spent many days in the study of this case, and I am satisfied that no impartial man can examine the record and conclude that there is any substantial reason to be found in that record for interfering with these awards.

THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE ON THE SUBJECT.

But I must press this inquiry further, reviewing the diplomatic correspondence that took place between the representatives of Mexico and this Government with regard to these claims.

First, however, let me say that the award in the Weil case was rendered October 1, 1875, and that the award in the La Abra case was rendered December 27, 1875. After this time, to wit, on the 29th of April, 1876, Mr. Fish, our Secretary of State, and Señor Mariscal, representing the Republic of Mexico, in a convention extending the time in which the mixed commission should conclude its labors, agreed that "the total amount awarded in all cases already decided," as well as those thereafter to be decided, should be regarded as finally settled in the manner proposed by the treaty. And again, on the 14th of December, those same officials, as I have already shown by the protocol, approved the decisions of the commission. And, as may be seen by reference to the documents accompanying the report of the committee, the Mexican attorney, Señor Eleuterio Avila, who had made the motions for rehearing, in a letter of November 25, 1876, to Señor Mariscal, stated:

First. The Mexican government, in fulfillment of article 5 of the convention of July 4, 1868, considers the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all claims referred to in said convention, reserving nevertheless the right to show, at some future time, and before the proper authority of the United States, that the claims of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and La Abra Silver Mining Company, No. 489, both on the American docket, are fraudulent and based on affidavits of perjured witnesses; this, with a view of appealing to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States Government, in order that the awards made in favor of claimants should be set aside.

This communication from Señor Avila was transmitted by Señor Mariscal to Secretary Fish, with its sentiments indorsed. Secretary Fish, on the 4th of December following, replied to Señor Mariscal:

I must decline, however, to entertain the consideration of any question which may contemplate any violation of, or departure from, the provisions of the convention as to the final and binding nature of the awards, or to pass upon, or by silence to be considered as acquiescing in, any attempt to determine the effect of any particular award.

With your appreciation of the objects in contemplation in this method of settlement of differences between the two governments, and with your intimate acquaintance with the particular provisions of this convention as with reference to the binding character of the awards made by the commissioners or by the umpire, you will readily appreciate my extreme unwillingness to consider that at the moment when the proceedings relating to the commission have been brought to a close, and the obligation upon each government to consider the result in each case as absolutely final and conclusive becomes perfect, the government of Mexico has taken or purposes to take any steps which would impair this obligation.

And on the 8th of the same month, in another communication to Mr. Fish, Señor Mariscal wrote:

It is not, then, the spirit of these statements to raise any doubt or difficulty in regard to the obligation of the Mexican government to submit to the results of the commission. Señor Avila has presented them, in fulfillment of instructions received from his government, with the only view I have endeavored to explain, and, for my part, I have communicated them to that department without any idea of raising questions of any kind whatever.

I congratulate myself to renew to you on this occasion the assurances of my very high consideration.

A BRILLIANT IDEA, AS WELL AS ORIGINAL.

After this prompt refusal by Mr. Fish to entertain any proposition looking to a rehearing of these awards, Señor Vallarta, of the Mexican department of foreign affairs, conceived the brilliant idea of bringing the subject before the American authorities in some shape or other and of rehashing the scheme of Señor Avila of appealing to the "sentiments of justice and equity of the American people." To this end he caused pamphlets containing arguments and portions of the records in the Weil and La Abra cases to be printed and distributed among members of Congress and other public officials, to whom, in the opinion of Mexico's chargé d'affaires at Washington, "it might be convenient to make known Mexico's reasons for making that appeal."

In his letter on the subject to the chargé d'affaires, he says the Mexican government does not purpose "to begin and maintain a controversy, in order that the decision of the umpire in the aforesaid cases should not be carried out, but simply to demonstrate the fraudulent character of the claims."

UNTENABLE POSITIONS.

Mr. Speaker, I have sought to review fairly the attitudes of the two governments touching this mixed commission and the Weil and La Abra claims in particular. Passing by the obligation of each government to carry out in good faith the stipulations of the treaty, the settlement and the protocol to which I have referred, we find Mexico occupying this position: she has protested by her diplomatic correspondence that her purpose is not to raise any doubt or difficulty with regard to her obligation to submit to the results of the commission or to begin or maintain a controversy that will defeat the decisions of the umpire, but simply to appeal to the sense of equity and justice of the United States—she appeals upon a ground and for a reason that are wholly mythical and untenable. Her pretensions in this regard would find no footing in any court in the country. Her people have murdered and robbed our citizens and as a last resort she agrees to submit to final arbitration; that arbitration goes against her. This Government is in honor bound to its own citizens to enforce the payment of those awards.

Mexico has submitted her application to the State Department, and it, familiar with the case in all its bearings, has decided against her. She has not made and could not make any application to this House. The rule that foreign governments cannot even communicate with this House is too well settled to need argument from me. I shall content myself with reading a letter written by Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State:

Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Mr. Genet, minister plenipotentiary from the Republic of France to the United States.

GERMANTOWN, November 22, 1793.

SIR: In my letter of October 2 I took the liberty of noticing to you that the commission of consul to Mr. Dannery ought to have been addressed to the President of the United States. He being the only channel of communication between this country and foreign nations, it is from him alone that foreign nations or their agents are to learn what is or has been the will of the nation; and whatever he communicates as such, they have a right and are bound to consider as the expression of the nation, and no foreign agent can be allowed to question it, to interpose between him and any other branch of the Government, under the pretext of either's transgressing their functions, nor to make himself the umpire and final judge between them.

* * * * * * *

I have the honor to be, &c.,

TH. JEFFERSON.

It is not only clear that Mexico, the republic, is entitled to no relief at our hands, but it is also clear that Mexico, the litigant, has no better claim. But I deem it scarcely worth while to discuss this point.

The decisions of our courts are too well understood to leave any doubt upon that subject.*

Mr. Speaker, the committee of which I have the honor to be a member did not believe that this House has jurisdiction over the question, but believed that it belonged entirely to the executive department of the Government, and therefore we have not held it to be wise or proper to go into the inquiry of the facts.

I will not depart now from the conclusion arrived at in the report of the committee, but if the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] who I understand has taken up the gauntlet for Mexico, desires to present his views now and should see fit to discuss the facts, I shall yield the floor to him and reserve the residue of my hour to reply to what he may say.

Mr. CHALMERS. Do I understand the proposition before the House now is the Senate bill, and that the motion made by the gentleman from West Virginia is to strike out the fifth section and insert in lieu thereof the fifth section of the House bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that the session this evening was simply for discussion of the pending proposition.

Mr. CHALMERS. Are we now considering the Senate bill with the proposition moved by the gentleman from West Virginia to strike out the fifth section and insert the fifth section of the House bill?

Mr. CRAPO. I can state to the honorable gentleman from Mississippi there was a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, which is now before us. There is also a bill on the same subject sent to the House from the Senate, which is likewise pending. The understanding was that the bills were to be considered together at the same time. I understand my colleague upon the committee from West Virginia, who has charge of this subject, instead of taking up the House bill, proposes to take up the Senate bill, which is within the understanding because both bills were to be considered at the same time; that is, instead of taking up the House bill, the Senate bill is to be taken up. Are we in the House or in committee?

Mr. WILSON. We are in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHALMERS. I so understand and that the gentleman from West Virginia moves to strike out the fifth section of the Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof the fifth section of the House bill.

Mr. CRAPO. Yes, sir; we are considering the Senate bill, and not the House bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAPO. We are considering the Senate bill, and the proposition before the House is to substitute for the fifth section of the Senate bill the fifth section of the House bill.

Mr. CHALMERS. That is just what I have stated.

Mr. WILSON. The House bill went upon the public Calendar some months ago. Only recently the Senate bill came to the House and was placed upon the Speaker's table. In the mean time, on the application of the Rosario and Carmen Mining Company of California, appealing for a rehearing of their case against Mexico, decided adversely by the umpire, another report was made. Those three reports are all to be considered, and it is perfectly competent to propose to amend one or the other.

Mr. CHALMERS. That was my understanding, but I merely wished to know whether I was correct or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of the Senate bill as it is and shall oppose the amendments offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON.] The first amendment is objectionable because it does not compel an investigation into the alleged frauds and the second because it reopens the whole of the question settled by treaty and is in fact a threat to the Mexican government that, in case it asks for an investigation into the two cases named by it as fraudulent and amounting only to $1,000,000, then the whole question involving four hundred and seventy millions shall be reopened. It is a species of terrorism unworthy of our great Republic in dealing with a weaker sister.

American citizens had claims against the Mexican government, Mexican citizens had claims against the United States Government, and a treaty was made on the 1st of February, 1869, whereby it was agreed that a commission, composed of a member chosen by each government and an umpire selected by the commissioners, should determine these claims and that the government against whom an excess was found should pay to the other the balance adjudged to be due.

Under this agreement claims were brought in by American citizens amounting to the sum of $470,000,000, growing out of transactions of only twenty years in the Republic of Mexico, during which time there cannot have been exceeding two thousand American citizens resident in Mexico. This in the outset is one of the startling facts in this case. The examination, however, reduced the claims from four hundred and seventy millions to four and a half millions. That was the amount found by the umpire to be due to citizens of the United States by Mexico. When that award was about to be announced, before it had been announced by the umpire, Mexico asked leave to protest against two claims known as the Weil claim and the La Abra claim.

Mr. WILSON. And several other claims.

Mr. CHALMERS. Those two claims in particular. The statement made by the umpire is in this language:

> In the case No. 447, "Benj. Weil vs. Mexico," the agent of Mexico has produced circumstantial evidence which, if not refuted by the claimant, would certainly contribute to the suspicion that perjury has been committed, and that the whole claim is a fraud. For the reason already given, it is not in the power of the umpire to take that evidence into consideration, but if perjury shall be proved hereafter no one would rejoice more than the umpire himself that his decision should be reversed and that justice should be done.

The Mexican government, in accordance with the hints thrown out by the umpire, then appealed to the equity and justice of the United States, as follows:

> The Mexican government, in fulfillment of article 5 of the convention of July 4, 1868, considers the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all claims referred to in said convention, reserving nevertheless the right to show at some future time, and before the proper authority of the United States, that the claims of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and La Abra Silver Mining Company, No. 469, both on the American docket, are fraudulent, and based on affidavits of perjured witnesses; this with a view of appealing to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States Government, in order that the awards made in favor of claimants should be set aside.

Now, then, I wish to call the attention of the House to the further language of the umpire upon that same subject:

> In the above-mentioned case, No. 469, the Mexican agent would wish the umpire to believe that all witnesses for the claimant have perjured themselves, while all those for the defense are to be implicitly believed. Unless there had been proof of perjury the umpire would not have been justified in refusing evidence to the witnesses on the one side or the other, and could only weigh the evidence on each side, and decide to the best of his judgment in whose favor it inclined. If perjury can still be proved by further evidence, the umpire apprehends that there are courts of justice in both countries by which perjurers can be tried and convicted; and he doubts whether the government of either would insist upon the payment of claims shown to be founded upon perjury.

That was the opinion of Sir Edward Thornton. Now, then, the Mexican government comes forward with the testimony and lays it before the United States Government, and asks, not to be excused from the payment of the award, not to have the treaty set aside, not denying but what the treaty is binding upon her if the United States Government sees fit to so decide, but simply applying to her as an act of justice and of equity to know whether this Government which has obtained this award by standing sponsor for its own people, whether this Government with the money in its hands will pay it over, provided it can be shown that the arbitrament was obtained by fraud and perjury in the witnesses.

Having asked leave to submit subsequently-acquired testimony on this case she now comes forward and submits this testimony and asks us to consider it. The Senate in the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress did so far consider it as to refuse to pass a bill which had passed the House for the distribution of the awards on the ground of alleged fraud. The Secretary of State has referred the question of distribution to this Congress, and called our attention to the fact that fraud has been suggested in two cases by the government of Mexico.

The Senate has passed a bill requiring the two cases in which fraud is alleged to be investigated within six months by the President and withholding any payments on these claims until this investigation can be had. The House committee to whom this question was referred has reported against directing investigation. In my judgment it is not only our right but our duty to have this charge of fraud investigated, and I propose now briefly to point out some of the evidences of fraud shown in the testimony which Mexico now offers for our consideration. Let us look at the two cases separately.

THE WEIL CASE.

The first of these cases is that of Benjamin Weil, who sets up a claim for nineteen hundred and fourteen bales of cotton said to have been taken from him in September, 1864, on the border of Mexico and almost in sight of the confederate army, which then held possession of Texas. The magnitude of this alleged seizure struck me with astonishment and induced me to investigate the subject. Investigation has convinced me that it is the most bald-faced and impudent fraud I have ever seen. I have been astonished that any man should have conceived the idea of presenting such a claim and still more astonished that he should ever have succeeded in obtaining an award in his favor. That one hundred and ninety-two wagons, drawn by fifteen hundred and thirty-six mules, and containing nineteen hundred and fourteen bales of cotton should have passed through the lines of two armies, the confederate and the Mexican, without the knowledge of either is to me incredible; that a train of fifteen hundred and thirty-six mules should have passed through an arid region of country

* When the parties have expressly or by reasonable implication submitted the questions of law as well as the questions of facts arising out of the matter of controversy, the decision of the arbitrators on both subjects is final. * * * Their decision cannot be appealed from, revised, or annulled by reason of any mistake which they may have fallen into. (Opinion of Chief-Justice Shaw, Boston Water-Power Company vs. Gray; Morse on Arbitration and Award, page 245.)

In other words they claim that the award, as to the partition, is invalid because the arbitrators have made an erroneous decision. That, however, would not vitiate the award, for it is well settled that the award, if made in good faith, is conclusive upon the parties; and that neither of them can be permitted to prove that the arbitrators decided wrong, either as to the law or the facts of the case. (Jackson vs. Ambler, 14 John. Rep., 105; Mitchell vs. Bush, 7 Cowen's Rep., 185; Winship vs. Jewett, Barbour's Chancery Reports, volume 1, pages 183 and 184.)

The award in this case is not so outrageous as of itself to constitute conclusive evidence of fraud or corruption. Error in judgment in the arbitrators is not a sufficient ground for setting aside an award. Nor will it be set aside on the ground that it is contrary to evidence if there is any evidence to sustain it. (Anderson vs. Taylor, 41 Georgia Reports, 10.)

when the confederate army could not move more than five hundred horses per day on account of the scarcity of water was equally incredible; that any man should, if he honestly owned this much cotton, have run the risk of attempting to move it without permit from the confederate government and without custom-house receipts from the Mexican government was astonishing, knowing, as he must have known, that it would be subject to seizure and confiscation by either government. I was struck with the fact, too, that no claim had been made for the one hundred and ninety-two wagons and the fifteen hundred and thirty-six mules, and learned that these were said to be confederate property. The astounding fact then arises that the confederate records do not show any return made by any quartermaster of these losses. Again, not one of the drivers of these one hundred and ninety-two wagons, who it is now said were confederate soldiers, could be found to testify in the case. The next impossible feature in the case is that the witnesses make the wagons cross the Rio Grande at a point where there is no ford and at a time when that river cannot be forded and at a point between Laredo and Piedras Negras, which would be two hundred miles out of the way to Matamoras, which was the alleged point of destination. The witnesses of the claimant were not posted upon the geography of the country and they did not fear that those who knew would ever contradict them in the facts. These are the internal evidences of fraud arising from the case itself and these misstatements of physical facts are the track which criminals always leave behind them and by which their crimes are discovered. It is often by such little circumstances as these we are able to follow and uncover secret crimes. It is thus that "murder will out."

More than that, no complaint was ever made to the Mexican government of this loss until after this treaty was made between the two governments for the adjudication of claims. These losses are represented as occurring in September, 1864. The treaty was not signed until February, 1869. This claim was never made until 1870. Now I say that upon the face of it it is a bald fraud.

But the claimants rested their case upon the testimony of one George D. Hite, a witness who swore positively that he had seen the cotton loaded at the town of Alleyton, in the month of March, 1864, and that on the 20th of September, while he was on his way back from Mexico, he saw the same cotton crossing the Rio Grande. Upon his testimony the judgment was recovered. Now Mexico comes forward with the proof of confederate officers who were in charge of that country at that time, and they make proof that no such thing could possibly have been done.

In the first place, I want to call your attention to the fact that this man Hite, who swears that he was at Alleyton in May, 1864, is shown by the proof to have been in Shreveport, Louisiana, seven hundred miles away, and to have remained there during the whole of the year 1864. On page 13 of the brief filed by General Slaughter before the Senate committee there is a reference to thirteen letters of Hite, the principal witness for the claimant, Benjamin Weil, and these letters show Hite to have been at Shreveport during the whole year 1864, and that he only entered the service of Weil & Jenny in 1865. Mexico now brings forward his own letters. She offers also the affidavit of R. F. Britton, setting forth that Hite was in Shreveport, in some department of the Government, in 1864, during the whole year.

Mr. WILSON. What does the gentleman read from?

Mr. CHALMERS. From a printed brief furnished to the Senate committee who considered this case.

Mr. WILSON. By whom?

Mr. CHALMERS. By James E. Slaughter, a general in the confederate army; and if I know a gentleman when I see him, he is one.

Next we have the affidavit of B. C. Brent, who testifies that Hite was at Shreveport; in the spring of 1864, was captain of the steamboat Countess; that afterward he was on duty in the quartermaster's department in the State of Louisiana. This witness says: "I know he was at Shreveport during the months of August, September, and October, 1864."

Then we have the testimony of W. R. Boggs, another confederate general, who was chief of staff of General Kirby Smith. He says that he was at Shreveport in 1863, 1864, and 1865; that he knew Hite, and Hite was at Shreveport throughout the year of 1864.

Mexico also offers the testimony of John E. Evins. This is the substance of his affidavit. He says:

Was United States collector at Laredo before the war; remained there during the war; was engaged in the freighting business during the war, hauling cotton; remained at Laredo until 1869; is acquainted with nearly everybody up and down the river for one hundred miles; knows the country thoroughly. There are no crossings for wagons above Laredo, between Laredo and Piedras Negras. Duties were always paid to the Mexican government at the local custom-houses. The distance from Alleyton to the Rio Grande is about two hundred and sixty miles. (Testimony of George D. Hite says it is seven hundred miles.) There are no ferries between Eagle Pass and Laredo. "I have never heard of Benjamin Weil. I have never heard of the seizure of any cotton. In my opinion, it would have been impossible for the Mexicans to take violent possession of nineteen hundred bales of cotton anywhere on the Rio Grande without my hearing of it." The custom-house officials on both sides of the river were very vigilant. "I do not believe that any one train of nineteen hundred bales of cotton belonging to one individual ever traveled across Texas to Mexico, and I will add that the seizure of such a large quantity of cotton would certainly have been heard of by me, if made at any point on the Rio Grande, much less in the neighborhood of Laredo. The news of such seizure would have circulated throughout Texas and frightened all traders."

Thus we have positive proof that Mr. Hite, the main witness, has sworn falsely; that he was in Shreveport, seven hundred miles away from the place where he says he was when he professes to have seen cotton loaded up and carried off.

I call attention, also, to the testimony of Weil himself. He swore that he had no partners. This was an important matter for this reason: the partnership went into bankruptcy, and when that bankruptcy case was up on trial in the United States court objection was made to the discharge of the partners upon the ground that no statement had been made in regard to this claim against Mexico; and upon that trial it was shown in the United States court that these men were partners of Weil, but that neither Weil nor the partnership had any such cotton as now claimed.

They prove that Weil had made a contract with the government of Louisiana to furnish supplies and carry out cotton. They say he had no money to carry out his contract and that other parties, Jenny, Bloch, and others, went into partnership with him and they furnished money to carry it out. What do these partners say on the subject of the cotton? Mr. Loeb, who was the authorized agent of Marx Levy, Bloch, and Benjamin Weil, says this:

Cross No. 3. Affidavit of S. E. Loeb, dated New Orleans, August 7, 1876, before Thomas Buisson. This affidavit sets forth the history of the copartnership and names of partners of Benjamin Weil; business done by the same; pecuniary condition; account of cotton received, and from whom; when sold, &c.; states at what time George D. Hite entered the service of Weil & Jenny; also, that Hite was not in the employment of Weil & Jenny at any time during the year 1864; that books, papers, &c., of the various firms of which Weil was a partner exist to-day, and were never destroyed as alleged; that he never heard of a seizure of cotton by the Mexican authorities until the claim of Weil was published in the newspapers; that no such amount of cotton as nineteen hundred bales, belonging to Weil, was ever at Alleyton, Texas; that George D. Hite was not a purchasing agent of Benjamin Weil; that he believes all the books of the firm in which Weil was a partner are at Opelousas, Louisiana; states how much cotton they had in the spring and summer of 1864, and the points at which it was deposited; states that this cotton was satisfactorily accounted for; states that Weil had no property outside of the partnership.

Cross No. 4. Affidavit of S. Firnberg, dated New Orleans, August 4, 1876. He was a member of the firm of Bloch, Firnberg & Co., which firm combined with that of Isaac Levy & Co., under the style of Levy, Bloch & Co. The firm of Isaac Levy & Co. was composed of Isaac Levy, Benjamin Weil, Marx Levy, and Jacob Levy. None of the firm had any individual property, real or personal. Benjamin Weil was a party to a contract with the State of Louisiana. He had no resources to carry out the contract. In 1864 Weil, for the firm of Levy, Bloch & Co., entered into a contract with Gustave Jenny, of Matamoras, under the name of Weil & Jenny. I have never heard of any claim against the "Government of Mexico," and "I know of my personal knowledge that the claim of Benjamin Weil against the government of Mexico is fraudulent. I was at the time of the origin of this claim a partner of Weil, and interested in all transactions, gains, or losses up to the dissolution of the partnership on the 19th of December, 1865. Had access to all books and papers, &c. First I heard of it was in the public press."

Cross No. 5. Affidavit of Louis Scherck, dated the 5th of August, 1876. Was a partner of Gustave Jenny. Knows Benjamin Weil. Jenny & Co furnished the goods to Benjamin Weil to carry out his contract with the State of Louisiana. I assisted them in delivering the stock to the agent of the State of Louisiana. This was in the summer of 1864. I then returned to Matamoras, and was there the latter part of that year. Never heard of any cotton being seized. Would certainly have heard of it had it been there and belonged to Benjamin Weil. Weil had no means of his own. All the means were furnished by C. F. Jenny. I held C. F. Jenny's power of attorney. The letters shown to me, marked E. W. H., in red ink, I recognize as letters of Gustave Jenny. I also recognize the letters of Benjamin Weil.

Cross No. 16. Affidavit of R. F. Britton, setting forth that Hite was at Shreveport in some department of the Government in 1864 during the whole year.

Cross No. 17. Affidavit of B. C. Brent. He testifies that Hite was at Shreveport. In the spring of 1864 he was captain of the steamboat Countess. After that he was detailed to Governor Allen, and was on duty in the quartermaster's department of the State of Louisiana. "I know he was at Shreveport during the months of August, September, and October, 1864." He did business at Shreveport in partnership with one James Parsons. He was under the immediate command of Colonel Wise. I know J. M. Martin, a pilot on Red River, another witness: "I would not believe him on oath." I knew S. B. Shackleford, another witness. He was a lieutenant in the confederate army. He was a sort of gambler. I do not know where he is. I have seen the letters signed George D. Hite. The signature is genuine.

Cross No. 18. Affidavit of E. W. Halsey. Was private secretary to Governors T. O. Moore and H. W. Allen from 1860 to 1865. Knew Weil, and Levy his partner. Knew they had a contract with the above-named governors. From frequent conversations with Weil knew that capital was furnished by Gustave Jenny, or Jenny & Co. Do not know of their ever having any cotton except that furnished by the governors. "Was very difficult to get permits from the military authorities to export cotton. These permits were indispensable for the transportation of cotton. Weil and Jenny did not receive sufficient cotton to pay them for goods supplied, and Weil brought a claim against the State of Louisiana for a large amount, which claim was paid. Although intimate with Mr. Weil during these transactions, he never spoke to me of losing cotton by seizures on the Rio Grande, or of exporting other cotton than that received from or through Governor Allen. Had he met such loss I would certainly have known it." Testifies to the signatures of various letters of Weil, Jenny and others, on which is written in red ink E. W. H.

Cross No. 20. Affidavit of L. G. Aldrich. Was a captain in the confederate army and adjutant-general stationed at Brownsville. States how the export of cotton was conducted, by what ports it should be exported, permits required, and all regulations thereto. Regulations of Mexican government for import of cotton. That all outrages by the Mexican authorities were promptly reported, and friendly relations between the authorities on both sides of the river at that time existed; that no capture of a train of cotton was ever reported; that the "capture of nineteen hundred bales of cotton by the Mexican authorities, without any knowledge of it reaching headquarters, I deem next to an impossibility."

Cross No. 23. Affidavits of W. R. Boggs, dated 17th day of August, 1876. Was a brigadier-general and chief of staff of General E. Kirby Smith, commanding trans-Mississippi department; was stationed at Shreveport in 1863, 1864, and 1865, and knew George D. Hite; that Hite was at Shreveport throughout the year 1864; he saw him from time to time; never heard of Benjamin Weil; never heard of any seizure of cotton; any seizure of cotton would have been heard of by me in my position.

This is certainly sufficient to show that Hite was in Shreveport and his testimony false. Weil in his testimony denied that he had any partners. This statement is contradicted by the affidavits read; but Mexico offers now:

Cross No. 21. Original articles of copartnership between the firms of Bloch, Firnberg & Co. and Isaac Levy & Co.

Original articles of dissolution of the partnership.

The first is dated the 11th of March, 1863, and the latter is dated New Orleans, the 11th of October, 1865.

These are the original copies. The originals, according to the civil law, are kept in the recorder's office, as shown by these copies.

Cross No. 22. It consists of various papers, telegrams, accounts-current, bills of lading of cotton and merchandise, receipts, &c., all showing the transactions of the various partners of Benjamin Weil, and of the firm of which he was one, and all proving conclusively that that firm never had any large amount of cotton at any one time; and that it never was in a pecuniary condition to have made large purchases of cotton, but all cotton received was in small lots, which were shipped at once, and no mention is made whatever to the nineteen hundred bales alleged to have been at Alleyton and subsequently captured by Mexican authorities.

She next offers a statement of the transactions of Benjamin Weil from the fall of New Orleans to the close of the war in his own handwriting, as follows:

Statement of my proceedings since the fall of New Orleans:

In August, 1862, Governor Moore proposed to me to load the schooner Washington, then a prize and anchored in Lake Charles. I went to work, got the cotton and transportation, but before the cotton reached the lake the Yankees came with a fleet and destroyed the schooner partly. I had to give up this expedition—was naturally in for all expenses.

I next took an interest in the schooner Lehman, which sailed from Lake Charles in March, 1863. The vessel landed in Tampico. The supercargo, after taking advance on the cotton, handed them over to another man, whom he appointed supercargo, and himself went with the whole of cotton to England and never returned. The new supercargo, after taking in a cargo at the mouth of the Rio Grande, ran into Galveston and disposed of the cargo, and I have never been able to collect one dollar.

About the same time I took an interest in the schooner Cecilia D. She also ran into Tampico, sold her cargo, and invested the whole amount in medicines and cotton cards, but was unfortunately captured on her trip in and sold in New Orleans as a prize.

Loaded about the same time a small schooner in Vermenton River, but up to date never heard her spoken of. Nobody knows what became of her.

I started for Mexico, and as quick as there invested all my ready cash in the schooner Star, loaded her with ordnance stores, started her with Mr. Levy, my partner, as supercargo. She made the trip safe in and out. Her trip back she was chased by the Yankees, and Mr. Levy set her afire within a mile of the Brazos. She was loaded with powder, shot, percussion-caps, spades, axes, &c. The loss on this vessel alone amounts to $30,000 in hard cash. We are interested in the schooners Hyer and Gilbertson. Both came in in January last loaded with amunitions of war and ordnance stores, but up to this day have never been able to get out.

After the schooner Star had left the port of Matamoras I remained, expecting fifty bales of cotton, the proceeds of which I intended to use as traveling expenses to go to Europe. My credit in Europe would have enabled me to purchase any amount of goods for the State of Louisiana. These fifty bales of cotton were first seized, forty bales afterward released, and I obliged to sell at the low price of the Matamoras market, say at seventeen cents per pound, so that after paying freight I had nothing left worth speaking of.

Then I sent to Mr. Loeb, my agent in Houston, for more cotton, who, late in the fall, started eighty-seven bales of cotton. The winter being very hard the cattle died on the road, while in the mean while the cotton agent took one-half of said cotton, and this expedition left me again in debt. Last I got in with Mr. Jenny, encouraged him to jointly take in his stock, and you know the remainder.

I submit this statement to your examination. It will prove to you that I have done all I could to forward the interest of the State.

B. WEIL.

SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA, October 18, 1864.

NEW ORLEANS, August 5, 1876.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is the handwriting and signature of B. Weil. I have seen him write and sign his name very often during the period to which this memorandum relates, say from May, 1862, as well as afterward, until May, 1865.

E. W. HALSEY,
Late Private Secretary to Governor T. O. Moore and to Governor H. W. Allen.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 5th of August, 1876.

THOMAS BUISSON,
Notary Public.

In addition to the above statement, there are several original letters of Weil, dated at Shreveport, in the fall of 1864, and one on September 20, the very day on which he swore the cotton was captured "from him" in Mexico. Referring to the whereabouts of Hite at the time of the capture, the Secretary of War states that the confederate archives contain a letter, dated at Matamoras, in October, 1864, one month after the alleged capture of the cotton, signed by Weil and Jenny, and addressed to Colonel J. C. Wise, chief quartermaster at Shreveport, asking the detail to their service of George D. Hite, then in his office. Colonel Wise, now a citizen of Louisiana, states that Hite was in his service at that time, and the cash-book of Weil and Jenny, which is produced, shows their first payment to Hite in 1865. Weil did have some little cotton transactions; but every bale of cotton that he carried out of the country was confederate cotton, was carried out by confederate teams for the purpose of bringing back powder, lead, clothing, and supplies for the confederate army.

And just here I would say that if this were a true and valid claim, if the cotton had been carried by Weil as claimed, the cotton was confederate cotton and would have belonged to the United States Government and not to Weil, after our surrender. Not only that, but if carried into Mexico there must have been proper permits from the confederate government and custom-house receipts from the Mexican government, or it would have been properly subject to legal capture by the Mexican government for violation of its revenue laws. Now, the claimant brings forward no such permit and no such receipts. Further, the testimony in this case shows that the cotton which Weil lawfully carried from Texas into Mexico was carried in confederate wagons, and driven by confederate soldiers who were the teamsters, and carried by confederate teams. Another remarkable thing in this case is that for these fifteen hundred and thirty-six mules and one hundred and ninety-two wagons which were taken, Mr. Weil sets up no claim against the Mexican government.

Mr. HANNA. Did these facts appear before the commission?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not know that they appeared there; but they are now offered by the Mexican government; whence she throws herself upon the equity and justice of the United States. There is no claim made for these teams and for these wagons. And if we look into the confederate records we find no quartermaster's report of any such loss. Is there a gentleman here who was connected with either army who believes for a moment that one hundred and ninety-two wagons and fifteen hundred and thirty-six mules could be lost and the quartermaster's department have no report of the loss? That is an absurdity upon its face.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Why is it that the Mexican government made no statement of this claim before the commission?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. And the gentleman can at the same time answer another question: why the Mexican government waited until the matter was submitted to this Congress, and then come in here to make an appeal to this Congress in order to defeat the payment of the money over to these parties?

Mr. CHALMERS. If the gentleman had been in his seat when I commenced my remarks he would have learned that before the umpire made his decision the Mexican government asked leave to show the facts which she now offers to show here. Before the umpire rendered his decision the Mexican government called upon him to take this testimony into consideration.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. And he declined to do so.

Mr. CHALMERS. He declined to do so because, he said, it had not been brought in in time; but he hoped that no government would hold money obtained by fraud and perjury.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Does not the gentleman know that the Mexican attorney knew that the umpire had no authority to receive any evidence, and that the American commissioner, Judge Wadsworth, of Kentucky, gave the Mexican commissioner, Zamacona, and the Mexican attorney, Vallarta, full and abundant opportunity to offer any evidence which they could offer, and agreed to postpone the case for that purpose, and they declined to do it.

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not know that fact. But admit that it is true; that would be no excuse for refusing now to consider evidences of fraud not discovered until after the close of the whole commission. I propose to show that the witnesses upon that occasion swore that the books had been destroyed; that Weil swore that he had no partners. The Mexican government, dealing as it was with the American Government and fighting against $470,000,000 of claims, is not to be blamed if it did not bring up all the testimony at the proper time. Suppose it is true that the testimony was not brought up then. The question now is, will the United States Government stand sponsor for thieves? Will the United States Government retain and distribute to its citizens money which has been obtained by fraud and perjury, simply because there may have been some laches on the part of the Mexican government in producing the testimony which it is now offering here? I for one, as a Representative in the American Congress, am not willing to take any such position.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one other question?

Mr. CHALMERS. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Is the Mexican government itself undertaking to break up the award of the commission, or is that being done by outside parties altogether?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will read again what the Mexican government says, and then the gentleman will understand it:

The Mexican government in fulfillment of article 5 of the convention of July 4, 1868, considers the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all claims referred to in said convention; reserving, nevertheless, the right to show, at some future time, and before the proper authority of the United States, that the claims of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, both on the American docket, are fraudulent and based on affidavits of perjured witnesses; this with a view—

Not with a view of breaking up the treaty, but—with a view of appealing to the sentiments of equity and justice of the United States Government, in order that the award made in favor of the claimants may be set aside.

Before I conclude my argument I will answer the question more fully. I propose now to go on with the history of the case.

The wagons conveying this cotton were represented as going through a particular part of Texas and crossing the Rio Grande where the river could not be forded, at a place where there was no ford, as Mexico now offers to prove by testimony, and at a time when the Rio Grande River was not fordable.

Now, sir, this testimony has been discovered since the adjudication, and Mexico comes forward with it and offers it as showing beyond controversy the fraudulent nature of this Weil claim. The only question for the American Congress to decide is, will we permit money thus obtained by fraud to be distributed to the thieves?

The next case—for I only pick out here and there of the testimony, for I would not weary the House with the whole of it—the next case is known as the

LA ABRA SILVER MINING CLAIM.

This company without doubt purchased a mine in the Republic of Mexico. Without doubt that company purchased machinery and carried it there for the operation of its mines.

But, sir, the claim made by that company for damages against Mexico is based on two grounds: first, that the mine was a valuable one, and second, that they were driven forcibly from that mine by the Mexican authorities. If these two facts should be established, then certainly they are entitled to damages. But how do they undertake to establish it? They bring in witnesses who swear in the first place (and it seems to have been considered as remarkable by Sir Edward Thornton) that there were no books and papers to be shown. They swear, as Weil did, that the papers and books were destroyed. Those papers have since been discovered and brought to light and are now offered by the Mexican government to confound and contradict the testimony of these witnesses. They swear they had a valuable property and that they were driven out of it; that they were driven out in March, 1868. They bought the property in 1864, at a time when war was going on in Mexico, and they left in 1868, after peace was established, and yet they pretend they were driven out by marauding parties of armed troops in the Republic of Mexico. That is a striking fact to be looked at in the first place. Another fact is that no other mines in that neighborhood seem to have been disturbed, or if they were, no proof of it has attracted my attention.

Let us look further to the testimony. They swear, as I have said, that no books and papers were kept. Since that time papers purporting to be the original papers and books containing the original letters of the company have been brought to light, and Mexico offers them to the United States Government, asking that they be considered. I am not here to say whether they are genuine books and papers or not. The Senate bill does not ask us to say these claims are even fraudulent, but the Senate bill does say there is such affirmative evidences of fraud that they should be examined into before the money is paid out.

I propose to read from some of these letters, and if they are genuine they certainly make out a prima facie case of fraud that is most startling to my mind. In the first place, sir, these letters show that so far from the Mexican government having disturbed this company in their rights, the Mexican government had protected them in their rights.

In a letter dated Tayoltita, February 6, 1866, from the La Abra Mining Company, written to D. J. Garth, who is the president of the company in New York, the agent, Thomas J. Bartholow, says this:

But, after the liberals took possession of the country and confiscated large numbers of mules, it was with the greatest difficulty that I could get any one to agree to pack at all; and had I not succeeded in getting military protection, our mill would now be lying at Mazatlan.

So far from interfering with them they got military protection from the government. Again, in a letter written March 7, when one of their men had been killed, the same agent of the company uses this language:

These facts were promptly laid before the commander of the liberal troops at San Ignacio, Señor D. Jesus Vega, who took great interest in the matter, and promised to use all the means in his power to discover the murderers and bring them to justice, and he had arrested and placed in confinement two men charged with the crime, and his soldiers are in pursuit of the third.

On April 10, this same agent writes again:

I inclose you a letter that I wrote to the collector of taxes at San Ignacio, which explains itself. The result was, instead of paying taxes to amount of three or four thousand dollars, as was demanded, we only paid about $30, and there was no necessity of troubling General Corona with the matter. * * * I wrote you fully in my last letter, detailing the circumstances of the murder of William Grove and the finding of his body. Since then the liberal authorities have taken the matter in hand and arrested one of the murderers at this place.

Showing that so far from interfering with them the government was absolutely extending protection to these mining people.

Now, sir, we have the testimony from their own letters contradicting the charge that the Mexican government had used violence toward them. But we have stronger evidence than even that. This man swears that the company was driven away in March, 1868. I propose now to read you a letter showing that in February of the same year the administrator of the La Abra company turned over possession of that very property to his own agent:

TAYOLTITA, February 21, 1868.

SIR: As circumstances are of such a nature as to compel me to leave for San Francisco and probably for New York, to inquire into the intentions of this company, I place in your hands the care and charge of the affairs of the La Abra Silver Mining Company, together with its property. You are invested hereby with all power confided to me, of course acting in all your transactions with an eye to the interest of the company. This will to you, should occasion require it, be ample evidence of the right possessed by you to act in their behalf.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. H. EXALL,
Administrator La Abra Silver Mining Company.

Mr. JAMES GRANGER.

The very same witness that swore he was driven away in March, 1868, and did not have time to gather up his papers, deliberately turns over the property to Granger on February 21. He goes to New York and on May 8 he writes a letter back to Granger after the time he now swears he had been driven away from there. That is not all. On June 16, 1868, from New York, he writes another letter and directs this to this very silver mining company in Mexico, and on July 16 he writes him another letter from Richmond, Virginia, and directs it to him again; to this very silver mine from which he subsequently swears the company had been driven away in March, 1868.

Now, I say, if these letters are genuine, and they bear upon their face internal evidence of truth, if they are genuine letters, a stupendous fraud has been perpetrated upon Mexico under the name and authority of the United States and by United States citizens.

But, sir, this is not all. We have here a letter from Mr. Granger, who is left in charge of this very work, written from these very mines on August 13, the mines from which they say now he was driven away in March, in which he writes to the Mexican government as follows:

[Translation.]

TAYOLTITA, 13 August, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I have received the communication calling upon this company to pay $52.50 each month for taxes imposed by the Legislature of the State, and presume it to be correct—

Paying taxes to the government of Mexico for a mine they had been driven out of; paying taxes in August for the mine from which they had been driven away in March. He says—

but as I am only acting in the absence of the superintendent, and as there is no money nor effects to pay this tax, I beg you to wait until the month of November, at which time said superintendent is to come, and then the sums due by this company on account of this tax will be paid.

Your most humble servant,

SANTIAGO GRANGER.

SR. D. REMIGIO ROCHA.

There is the Mexican government, that is treating him with inhumanity and violence, calling upon him for the taxes, and they are asked for a suspension of payment of the taxes, and there is no evidence but Mexico acceded to the proposition. That, too, dated from the mines in August, when this false witness swears they had been driven out in March of the same year. I suppose that disposes of the question whether they were driven away by violence.

I come now to the question of the value of the mines, and this testimony again shows on its face that these gentlemen were deceived about their mining property. They thought they had a good property, but their own letters show when the light commenced to break upon them that the mines were worthless. On October 8, 1866, the superintendent at that time writes to the treasurer in New York, and says:

I doubt whether your expectations will be ever realized respecting the looked-for yield of metal from the mines, though sufficient may be had to repay well, I trust.

That is the first time they indicate any idea the mines were not profitable.

Mr. WILSON. What page?

Mr. CHALMERS. Page 36. Next I read from page 39. Mr. Garth writing back to the agent says:

I trust that despite what you say you will find some way to satisfy the draft.

They had got into debt; they could not pay their debts. The agent was writing to the company, and Mr. de Laguel answers in this language:

I trust that despite what you say you will find some way to satisfy the draft, for, if it goes to protest, it will be of incalculable injury to the best interests of the company. To me the consequences of such a thing would be both mortifying and most embarrassing; but to the company's interests they would prove far more serious.

Then upon page 43 Mr. Garth writes again to Mr. Exall, as follows:

If, however, the ores are indeed worthless, I don't see that any process of working will be of any avail, and have the worst fears that our enterprise will, after all, be fruitless of good.

Another extract from the same, on page 44, from a letter written on the 10th of June:

We have not heard from you since Colonel de Laguel left Mexico, but hope that you are well and getting along as well as could be expected. The account that Colonel de Laguel gave us of the quality of the ores on hand was most unexpected and a fearful blow to our hopes.

Mr. HANNA. Is there any statement of what they gave for the mines?

Mr. CHALMERS. About $50,000.

Mr. HANNA. What is the amount of the award?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Altogether they gave over $299,000. The amount of money expended there was proven before this commission by Mexicans themselves. I suppose the gentleman will not deny that.

Mr. CHALMERS. I did not pay attention to the amount expended, for I do not conceive that the Mexican government would be bound to pay money to a man for that which was spent in a bad speculation. I propose to show by their own testimony that the mines were worthless and that they were abandoned because they were worthless.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Do you deny that that amount of money was expended?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not deny it, for I do not know.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Do you deny that the Mexican government did derive benefit from the expenditure of that $299,000?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do deny most emphatically that the Mexican government ever got anything from it. This money was spent upon a worthless mine. It cost these men more to take the ore out than it was worth. Every agent they had they were in debt to. They made no money and the Mexican government got nothing from the mines and nobody else got anything from them.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It was because the Mexican government and its bands interfered with and destroyed the property.

Mr. CHALMERS. That I deny. The gentleman cannot put his finger on a line from their own letters to show any such thing. I propose to show that they abandoned the mines.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Because your bands interfered with them.

Mr. CHALMERS. Not at all; our bands, as you call them, never came near them.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The commission decided in favor of the company.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, and they did so upon false testimony of the witnesses that I am now showing.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. And it is only afterward that your bands of men and the gangs came in since for the purpose of setting the award aside so that they might procure the money themselves.

Mr. CHALMERS. Never.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Of course I do not mean the gentleman.

Mr. CHALMERS. I hope the gentleman will be a little more guarded in his language, for it does seem to me that the position of an American Congressman is one of exceeding delicacy. I do not pretend to charge that the heavy fees given out for the procurement of this million of dollars from Mexico, where the attorneys are to receive one-half of the award, has crept into this Congress at all. And I do not propose that the gentleman shall insinuate that I or any one I represent is influenced by any such consideration.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Pardon me; I did not insinuate that you had anything to do with it, or that you had any knowledge of anybody who has. But I do assert boldly and unqualifiedly that there is a gang hanging around here endeavoring to influence action upon this subject.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir; there is a gang here that has dogged my steps about the House and to my lodgings, and who have sat up with me until midnight and then come back the next morning before breakfast. They have haunted my steps, ever since they learned I was opposed to this bill until now, endeavoring to get me not to resist this steal from Mexico. It is a raid upon the government of Mexico organized and pressed by the most powerful lobby that I have ever known since I have had the pleasure of a seat in this Congress. The gentleman is right; the air is full of the cries of men who are laboring for this steal in order to obtain some pecuniary consideration. But I go back to my argument. Upon page 45 of the same testimony the president of the company writes again:

It seems almost incredible that all parties should have been so mistaken in the value of the ore now on the "patio."

The light is breaking on him, still he does not believe it; he says it seems incredible. Now we go back to the letter of Mr. Exall in this matter to the treasurer of the company. He says in a letter dated June 11:

In respect to the compromise of which you spoke it was made while I was in Mazatlan, to last until I should return, and then I was to arrange with you as best I could. And if you had known the circumstances and causes which led to the paralyzation of the works it would have been apparent to you that it was not possible to do otherwise.

Here is the agent saying that the works had been paralyzed in July, 1867, long before the time that the company abandoned them. Again on August 5 this same agent writes to the treasurer:

The mill is now running on the same ore as I last worked. This run will finish it, and what ore to work on then I know not. There is of course some little good ore in the great heaps on the patio, but it will have to be closely assorted, and the greater portion requires roasting, which is a slow operation and costly. I will at any rate do my best. I am now working twenty men by carga, pay them not over $1 per week in cash. I must give them some little money. These are working in the Arroyan and on the dump of the Rosario. The Cristo is now idle, also La Luz and Abra. I can get no metal from them which will pay.

That is a letter written August 5, 1867. Gentlemen say that the marauding bands of Mexico drove these men out of their rich mines, when their own agent as far back as August 5, 1867, says that they can get no ore from it that will pay. He continues:

The Cristo and La Luz, which have been worked for over a year, I am privileged to stop for four months. The Abra I must work; will put in some men and see what can be found. No further prorogues will be given, and although I have no fear of any one denouncing the mines I must not leave them unprotected.

By "denouncing" he refers to the Mexican law, which permitted a mine that was abandoned to be denounced, and it was then sold to somebody else. In this same letter Mr. Exall furnishes a statement of the amount that the company had made from May 27 to July 13, and it was $420.09—only this small amount in that time. Again in the same letter he says:

The assays which were made from samples taken from battery sluices, and which were made daily, vary in value; the greatest number gave $13.50 per ton, (silver.)

Why, sir, the witnesses introduced by these men before the commissioner swore that it was worth $500 per ton. Now, this letter says that the greatest amount obtained was $13.50 per ton.

In October 6, 1867, Mr. Exall writes again to Mr. Garth:

I was much disappointed that my urgent demand for money was not favorably answered. I have complied with the requests in your various letters in reference to giving you exact information concerning affairs here. I now have to urge you to send me means. I have heretofore been keeping above water by using the stock which I fortunately had on hand. That is now entirely exhausted. I have neither money, stock, nor credit. The latter I would not use even if I had it, as in this country it is an individual obligation and no company affair. Now, you must either prepare to lose your property here or send me money to hold it (and that speedily) and pay off debts of the concern.

That is the language of their own agent, written in October, 1867, long before they pretend to have been driven out by these predatory bands. He says further:

There is no difficulty about authorities, boundaries, or anything else concerning the mines and hacienda provided there is money on hand, and money must be sent.

This is the same letter in which he begs for money. He says: "There is no difficulty about authorities," thus testifying directly contrary to what he subsequently swore to, that the authorities were interfering with him.

I hope that I have urged this point sufficiently so that you may see fit to send me something to hold the mines. I should be sorry to see them lost on this account. Please telegraph me if you intend sending money.

Then, writing again on December 18 a long letter, he recites the amount of money that is due. He says:

I am utterly unable to oppose them. First, I have no means, and, again, I am not your agent here, never having received a power of attorney from you, which will be necessary, for I cannot act in these courts without it. The Bank of California ——, and will do something to recover the amount of the draft, and before the amount is doubled by the expenses, for God's sake telegraph to and pay them. Matters of this nature once getting into the courts, it takes large sums to oppose them. The first steps taken by the courts will be to send some one to the hacienda to see to and secure everything there. This will, of course, stop everything and make it impossible for me to protect your interests. For your own sake in the matter, pay them before things go further.

The next letter is one to which I have already referred, in which he turns over the company to Mr. Granger, and starts for New York. In New York what does this delightful witness do? He there finds some parties who want to buy a silver mine, and he tries to "put up a job" on them. He writes back to his man Granger in this way:

Since being here, I have seen these people daily, and have given them every information which would tend to make them think favorably of the property—given statements, accounts, inventories, indebtedness, &c., besides speaking as favorably of the property as possible.

In the same letter he says:

I have given these parties a condensed summary of accounts of La Abra Silver Mining Company. I inclose a copy. You will see it does not accord with the books, but I give it this way, as requested by the party who is endeavoring to start the company.

He was endeavoring to post his witness as to what he should say to these gentlemen when they came to examine the mine:

I should not like these parties to come in contact with Green, Martin, or any one who would prejudice them, &c. If we can succeed, as I have stated here, we will be doing well as things are situated. Send me as soon as possible power to act for you. I can imagine your feelings away out in that damned, gloomy place and truly sympathize with you and doing all in my power to get you away as soon as possible.

This is the fellow who was driven away by the marauding band; this is the rich silver mine that he was driven from. Again he says:

The books don't let any one see, for reasons which will occur to you.

Granger was smart enough to know what that meant. Again, writing from Richmond, he says:

I will in time write you as things develop. By all means keep the mines secure, particularly the Abra; don't allow any one to touch the books or don't give any statements; these affairs are now in our hands.

This is the witness who comes up afterward to give all this testimony.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. What date is that?

Mr. CHALMERS. The date is July 18, 1868.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. They were not driven from that mine till 1868.

Mr. CHALMERS. Exactly. March, 1868, is the time when they say they were driven from the mine; and this letter is written in July, 1868, in which he says to Granger, "Keep the mine; hold the fort." He swears afterward that they had been run out, that they could not "hold the fort."

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If the gentleman will pardon me a moment, I can refer him to the evidence of more than a dozen men whose high character is certified to by the United States consul at Mazatlan, and who say:

In conclusion, we would state that the re-establishment of the company was rendered impossible from the fact that immediately after the incidents herein referred to the entire State became involved in revolution; the roads infested with banditti and with troops of various parties; communication entirely interrupted, and all means of transportation seized.

This was the condition of things in June, 1876, when you say the company had possession of the mines; and this statement is signed by a dozen or more most reputable citizens.

Mr. CHALMERS. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that document. I intended to pay my respects to it, but I forgot it. If he will pass it over to me I will attend to it now.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. With a great deal of pleasure, sir.

Mr. CHALMERS. Now mark you:

The liberal forces under Corona occupied the approaches to this post, while Lozado with his Indians invaded the state from Jalisco; and in November of that year (1864) the French took possession of the town itself.

In 1864, was it? Why, that is the time you bought the mine; that is the time the Mexican government protected you, according to your own letter; that is the time the gentlemen said but for the protection of the Government their engine would have been left at Mazatlan; that is the time fixed upon when marauding troops were running through Mexico!

I call attention to the fact that in 1868 the French were driven out and peace was restored as far as it can be to that down-trodden republic.

Mr. LAPHAM. Maximilian was dead.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, Maximilian was dead and his wife a maniac, and your people were trying to rob Mexico—I beg pardon, I will not say your—these people were trying to rob Mexico of the few dollars that intense internecine war had left to her.

This testimony, so far from helping the gentleman's case, shows conclusively that the troubles in Mexico were in 1864, at the very time this property was purchased and that the Mexican government extended every facility to the owners of the mine to become citizens of that country.

As I have said before, the American Government stood sponsor for her claimants and it will be a disgrace to the American Government if she refuses to accede to the just demands of Mexico when Mexico comes and asks for equity and justice at our hands. Mexico does not refuse to pay the money. How shall America stand when her Senate the other day said to the British government, "we will pay your fishery award provided you will say on your honor that you believe it to be just. We do not believe it is right; we do not believe when three judges are appointed to make an award the judgment of two is good; but if in the judgment of England it is thought it is all right we will pay the money." We present the case to her; we present the extravagance of the demand; we say the fisheries are not worth what is awarded for them; we say if England demands it under the treaty we will pay it.

Mexico stands in the same attitude toward us. She says she stands by the treaty, but she asks the United States Government in honor and justice to examine these claims to see whether they are equitable and just and whether it will not refuse to allow this money to be paid into the hands of these thieves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. I hope by consent of the House I will be allowed to go on for fifteen minutes longer.

Mr. WILSON. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, Congress has the power, as decided by the Supreme Court, to annul a treaty if it sees proper to do so. But that question does not arise here. That is what I wish to argue. Mexico does not dispute the treaty. The Government of the United States is not setting aside the treaty as against Mexico. I put this case: you say every charter granted by this Government or by the Legislature of a State conveys a vested right in a corporation. Congress cannot set it aside to the detriment of the corporation, but if the corporation comes and asks an amendment of the charter no man can say the Congress or Legislature has not the power to change the charter. So here is a treaty made between Mexico and the Government of the United States. If Mexico was opposed to breaking the treaty certainly the United States could not break it. But Mexico does not ask that. She simply says, Look into this matter, and if you are satisfied your own citizens are swindling stop it. We do not ask you to break the treaty, but simply the question whether fraud, which vitiates everything, shall be permitted to come in and enable these men to take the money they are not entitled to.

The question gentlemen ask me much more easily arises when our Senate undertook to say they would not pay the money to England under the fishery award after England had paid its money to us on the Geneva award. Learned men in the Senate, men learned in the law, have passed a resolution which, I think, we will all stand upon in reference to the fishery award, and the same men learned in the law in the Senate have passed the pending bill which they have sent to us.

There is high authority for the doctrine that a government may refuse to respect an award unjustly or erroneously granted, and that without a breach of international obligations. Vattel says, page 277:

> The faith of treaties should be religiously observed. If, however, the arbitrators, by pronouncing sentence evidently unjust and unreasonable, should forfeit the character with which they are invested, their judgment should deserve no attention.

And Mr. Seward, late Secretary of State, in an unpublished note of March 3, 1869, addressed to the Venzuelan chargé de'affaires, takes the same ground.

In 1827, the northeastern boundary question was submitted by the United States and Great Britain to the arbitration, not of a mixed commission of citizens, but of a friendly sovereign, their peer, and yet the Government of the United States, both in its executive and legislative branches, declined to submit to the solemn decision given by the King of the Netherlands.

Doubtless the Mexican government, if, as is stated, it possesses proof of the fraud and perjury in these two claims, considers the awards upon them "unjust and unreasonable," and therefore would be justified, according to Vattel, in offering us the proof in lieu of the money. If, instead of doing this, Mexico has preferred to make a tender of payment with one hand while holding the proof of fraud in the other, it is so much to her credit, and her "appeal to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States," supported as it is by the honorable declarations of the umpire, should meet with some response. When a nation has lent the aid of its sovereignty to the prosecution of a private claim against another, it ought to be rather sensitive than otherwise to imputations on the character of its protégé. Such a becoming sensibility was manifested in the case of the brig Caroline, where a claim which our Government had collected from that of Brazil proved to have been unfounded. In the language of Secretary Fish, (Sen. Doc., 1st sess. 43d Cong., Ex. Doc. No. 52, p. 165,) "When the amount had been realized the question of paying it to the holder of the claim arose in the mind of my predecessor, Mr. Seward. This question involved that of the liability of the Brazilian government in such a case, and Mr. Seward referred it to the Attorney-General. It has remained with that officer until recently, when it was by him decided in the negative. * * * It was then deemed advisable to return the sum received to the government of Brazil." Not only was the sum held by the State Department so returned, but Congress was called upon to make and did make (Stats. 43d Cong., p. 70) an appropriation to refund a further sum, which it was discovered (after the determination to restore the amount collected had been reached) had been received and, as it was alleged, fraudulently disposed of by our minister.

In the debate in the House on this clause of the consular and diplomatic bill (RECORD, 1st sess. 43d Cong., p.—) it was stated by Mr. E. R. Hoar, then a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that the decision of the Government was based mainly upon an opinion of Attorney-General Cushing, given in the matter of a claim against the United States, affirming the well-known principle of the law of nations, that where foreigners have the same access to the courts of a country as citizens the Government is not bound for the unskillfulness, error, or even corruption of its officers, but "only for such injury to individuals as may occur by acts of such officers performed in the proper behoof and business of the Government."

Here a question purely of legal responsibility was voluntarily reopened by our Government, the position which it had maintained abandoned, the money erroneously collected refunded, and when it was alleged that fraud had also been committed Attorney-General Williams promptly directed proceedings to be taken against the offender. If the national honor required that a mistake of law should be rectified, with what grace can we refuse to examine the gross mistakes and fraudulent perversion of fact under which the Weil and La Abra claims are alleged to have been allowed?

The fact that the claims against Mexico were prosecuted by our Government through the agency of a mixed commission established by treaty cannot lessen our obligation not to enforce an unjust demand, especially when the defective character and methods of investigation of these tribunals, compelled as they are to rely upon ex parte affidavits for the proof of facts, are taken into consideration.

For three-fourths of a century the United States has declined to make compensation to its citizens for private rights which it is alleged were bartered away in the treaty with France.

The right of the Government to revise awards made by the commission instituted under the Florida treaty (in which treaty the United States expressly obligated itself to Spain to "make satisfaction" to claimants) was upheld by Attorney-General Cushing, (6 Op., 533.)

Payment of the American claims against Venezuela has been and still is suspended on the same ground.

But it cannot be claimed that the action in these cases constituted an infraction of treaty rights by our Government. The exclusion of the insurance companies would not warrant a disregard by Great Britain of the provisions of the treaty of Washington, nor could Mexico have reclaimed the territory we acquired from her because of our broken promise to treat the award in favor of Gardner as a "finality." As to Venezuela, she was expressly told (Ex. Doc. 176, 41st Cong., 2d sess.) that her charges of fraud could not be listened to while she was in default in her payments under the treaty, and to these she is still held by the act of 1873.

The gentleman said the House of Representatives had nothing to do with treaties; that the President and the Senate must control these things. The Senate sent us the bill, and here I beg to call the attention of gentlemen to the difference between the Senate and the House bill. The Senate bill said this money should not be paid over until these frauds are investigated. That is all there is in it. There is a large amount of these claims that are just and ought to be paid. We do not ask you now to decide that the Weil and La Abra claims are frauds—we simply ask an investigation. I say I am in favor of the Senate bill. I am in favor of passing it and requiring the President to make an investigation within six months, and if the claims are found fraudulent withhold the money; if not, pay it over.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Are you to prevent the payment of those just claims in order to defeat imaginary or fraudulent claims?

Mr. CHALMERS. No, sir; the Senate bill does not do that. The Senate bill provides all the just claims shall be paid immediately. I make no objection to that. But I say, Mr. Speaker, and I do not wish to weary gentlemen unnecessarily, I do not think that this House now should undertake to assert doctrines gentlemen have asserted here in view of their own action in regard to the Venezuelan award and in view of their own action in regard to another celebrated case that occurred in this country about thirty years ago, a case which ended in a tragedy in this very city.

A man by the name of Gardner thirty years ago, under a commission which arose under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, undertook to swindle Mexico precisely as the La Abra Mining Company has done, and it is said, I do not know with what truth, that some of the men who were instrumental in getting up the proof in this case were old practiced hands who had learned their lessons in the Gardner fraud. That commission not only decided in favor of Gardner, but paid him the money. He got the money, deposited it in a bank in this city, and went abroad to live on the fruits of the fraud he had perpetrated. This Government did not at that time know their hands were tied. They had this man arrested, brought him back, and had him tried here in the courts of the District; and history states that when the verdict of guilty was brought in and when the judgment of the court was pronounced, he applied poison to his lips and fell dead in the very halls of justice. If inquiry could be made when so long a time had elapsed and when the money had been paid, why in the name of God can we not stop payment if we have satisfactory evidence to prove or reasonable ground for believing that fraud has been perpetrated?

I thank the House for having extended my time.

Mr. WILSON. As I before stated, Mr. Speaker, it was not the purpose of the committee to go into an investigation of the facts in these two cases, the Weil and La Abra; but we chose to content ourselves with what we believed to be the whole duty of the committee, reporting upon the law of the case. Since the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] has been pleased to discuss very fully what he alleges to be the facts of the case, it is due to my committee that I should reply to his argument; and if I fail to satisfy every reasonable man on this floor that the Republic of Mexico stands before this Congress and this country covered all over with fraud and guilty by her agents of an effort to suborn testimony, it will be because of my own weakness, and not that the fact is not fully proven.

Take Mexico as a republic or take her as a litigant and I declare that I have never seen in a civil or criminal case any party so tainted with fraud.

Mr. Speaker, a fair, impartial examination of this evidence will bring home to the gentleman from Mississippi, if he reads it, the fact that that La Abra Company, after having expended $300,000, was driven from Mexico by a conspiracy comprising, among others, a judge of a Mexican court and one Granger, the boss of the mine, who afterward married that judge's daughter. There is no controversy about the fact that the La Abra Company expended in the purchase and improvement of its property about $300,000. This is clearly proven by both Mexican and American witnesses, and yet the gentleman is pleased to pronounce the mine a worthless one, the ore of no value, and the speculation a bad one, and to charge that they abandoned it because of its want of value.

Let me tell the gentleman that I have lying upon my table a copy of Ward's History of Mexico, written in 1827. We learn from that history the fact that when Mexico belonged to Spain and was required to pay one-fifth of all the earnings of her mines to the King of Spain, a little group of mines, of which La Abra was one and the richest, paid to the king $11,000,000. That was the king's fifth.

Let me tell that gentleman that if he will examine the evidence in this case impartially and fairly——

Mr. CHALMERS. I shall do my duty in the case.

Mr. WILSON. Do not be restive, my distinguished friend; I will——

Mr. CHALMERS. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. I will attend to you in this matter. If the gentleman will examine the evidence impartially he will find that an experiment was made with twenty tons of that La Abra ore and it yielded from six hundred to eight hundred dollars per ton. That mine has been known in history for half a century as one of the richest silver mines on the continent. The evidence on behalf of the claimants, on which the umpire acted, was taken nearly five years before his decision was rendered. It was the evidence in part of gentlemen who for integrity, credibility, and high standing are the peers of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] and of any other gentleman within the sound of my voice. I have known some of them long and well, and no gentlemen stand higher for integrity than they do.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi has flourished in the face of this House a pamphlet or brief of General Slaughter, and read from it extensively. It seems to be his whole stock in trade in the argument of this question. It is a petition of General Slaughter, appealing, on his own motion, for relief for Mexico from the payment of the Weil and La Abra claims. The gentleman from Mississippi, however, has failed to inform the House that General Slaughter did not dignify his petition by his own affidavit, nor did he give any assurance to this House or to the country that the facts contained in it are true or that the letters it purports to give are genuine.

GENERAL SLAUGHTER'S PETITION.

General Slaughter does not claim to be a citizen of Mexico; on the contrary, he claims to be a citizen of Alabama. While I do not say a word to wound the feelings of General Slaughter, I will say that the gentleman from Mississippi has chosen voluntarily to thrust his statement forward in this House, and I propose to talk about him with candor and fairness, and with that degree of fullness which my duty as a member of the committee whose report has been assailed requires.

General Slaughter does not claim to be the agent of Mexico, nor does he claim to be her attorney. As I have said, his statement is not sworn to. He simply petitions this House, as a citizen of the United States, and asks that Mexico have the relief for which she has applied, and for this General Slaughter says he will ever pray. I pray to be informed what interest General Slaughter has in this matter. What inducement prompts him to leave his Alabama home and come here to petition Congress in behalf of Mexico in a matter in which, from all the papers before us, he can have no earthly interest? Perhaps I can let a little light in upon this subject.

I have here the argument of another gentleman equally as reputable as General Slaughter, the argument of Governor Stanton, a prominent lawyer in this city. He is attorney for the La Abra Company. He states that General Slaughter had three, or was interested in three, claims before this mixed Mexican commission, one for $35,000, one for $5,000, and another for a million dollars. He failed to derive a dollar from any one of his claims from that commission. General Slaughter was cheek-by-jowl with the other American claimants, but he got no money. Perhaps for the purpose of repairing his broken fortunes he now turns upon his fellow-claimants.

Mr. CHALMERS. I claim the right to protect the gentleman whose statement I have quoted here. General Slaughter went to Mexico along with a number of other confederates and entered into a contract with the Mexican Republic to build railroads for it, and he did so. His claims were stricken out because it was decided that a man cannot get an award upon claims arising upon contracts.

Mr. WILSON. This is not the first time that the gentleman from Mississippi has testified in this matter. I protest against his testifying in this case unless he is sworn.

Mr. CHALMERS. Does the gentleman insinuate that I have stated anything that is not true?

Mr. WILSON. I am not saying that; but I say that if he wishes to testify in the case let him be sworn. I will tell the gentleman exactly what he has done. I will come to that part of his argument. And I propose to criticise it as fully and fairly and freely as I please.

Mr. CHALMERS. That you have perfect liberty to do.

Mr. WILSON. I will do it without fear or favor or affection. But I have not got done with this Slaughter pamphlet yet. He says:

> That your petitioner also learned that a motion for a rehearing of this claim had been made in January, 1876, by the counsel for Mexico before the commission, but had been returned by the umpire with the statement that he could not rehear any claims until he had decided all those before him.
> That subsequently to this time the term of the commissioners having expired, but before the expiration of the additional six months allowed by the treaty to the umpire for completing his decisions, your petitioner came into and is now in possession of affirmative evidence of the fraudulent character of the claim of said Weil, of a portion of which evidence an abstract is hereto appended, marked Exhibit A.
> That your petitioner offered this evidence to the counsel of the Mexican government aforesaid, by whom it was tendered to the umpire in September, 1876, in support of his motion for a rehearing.

I want gentlemen to notice this matter. I propose to utilize this word "umpire." He says the evidence was offered to the umpire.

Now, sir, tell me how it comes that a gentleman who is not the agent for Mexico, not an attorney for Mexico, thrusts his argument in the face of Congress, a statement which is not sworn to and which we are asked to rely upon to the entire exclusion of sworn evidence of competent witnesses. Now I propose, with all kindness to General Slaughter, to submit to the candid judgment of this House whether that paper which he has here flourished before Congress is not condemned by the law as a felonious act. I ask you gentlemen who are good lawyers to determine whether the course of General Slaughter in sending here his own unsworn statement and interfering with the affairs between Mexico and this Government is not condemned by our statute as a felonious act; whether if the law were enforced he would not forfeit his liberty and be subjected to a heavy fine. If gentlemen will turn to the Revised Statutes they will find a most interesting chapter upon the subject of "crimes against the existence of the Government." When our fathers formed the present Constitution they conceived the idea that this Government never could exist unless treaties with foreign powers were carried out in good faith. With this view they provided as early as 1799 that any party who, without the authority of his Government, should interfere in matters of this kind should be subject to fine and imprisonment. I call attention to section 5335 of the Revised Statutes. The first section is against treason; then there is one against misprision of treason; the next is directed against "inciting or encouraging rebellion or insurrection;" and the next against "criminal correspondence with foreign governments." Observe the language of this section:

> SEC. 5335. Every citizen of the United States, whether actually resident or abiding within the same, or in any foreign country, who, without the permission or authority of the Government, directly or indirectly, commences or carries on any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government, or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States; and every person, being a citizen of or resident within the United States, and not duly authorized, who counsels, advises, or assists in any such correspondence, with such intent, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months, nor more than three years; but nothing in this section shall be construed to abridge the right of a citizen to apply, himself or his agent, to any foreign government or the agents thereof for redress of any injury which he may have sustained from such government, or any of its agents or subjects. (See sections 1738, 2113.)

FACTS FROM A CERTIFIED COPY OF THE EVIDENCE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here a certified copy of the evidence in the La Abra case; and the proof shows (there is no controversy about it) that that company paid $50,000 for the mine. The improvements they made and the property they took there and the expenses they incurred aggregated about $300,000 in money. They paid all the tariff charges upon the personal property they took there. They had to pay overland charges amounting sometimes to as much as $600 for the privilege of going across the country with their mule-trains. More than that, I have here the evidence to show that they were compelled to pay to the Mexican government 65 per cent. of the value of their personal property as a tax. The company had two agents or superintendents at the mines—one the general superintendent and the other the "boss miner"—the expert, or professional miner as he calls himself, the man who judged the mineral. His name was Granger. The superintendent, Exall, whom the gentleman from Mississippi has read about, was the general outside manager; Granger was the man who understood minerals. Exall, the superintendent, was arrested and put into a pest-house, confined without any authority or any legal proceedings whatever. The company's mules were driven away, their property spoliated. They were compelled to leave the mining district. The purpose not being yet accomplished, the judge of that place issued this order:

SECOND COURT CONCILIADOR, TAYOLTITA.

To the Superintendent of the Abra Reducing Works:

By the communication of yesterday, dated the 3d, received from the gefe político of San Dimas, I notify you that if you do not intend to work the Abra mines as they were formerly worked, upon the system of "thirds," that you immediately vacate the mines, to allow the operatives to work them upon their own account without further loss of time.

Liberty and reform.

GUADALUPE SOTO.

TAYOLTITA, July 4, 1867.

In the same month, as the superintendent still remained there, the judge issued a further order, in which the following language was held:

You are ordered to arrange your work with the operatives within two hours; and if you come to no arrangement you will vacate the mines so that they may lose no more time.

Liberty and reform,

GUADALUPE SOTO.

TAYOLTITA, July 24, 1867.

And in the same month M. Mora, the gefe político of San Dimas, issued his order to the representatives of the mines to "give the people permission to collect ores in the mines, as I will not hold myself responsible for the consequences in a town where the people are without work." And this imperial order is signed in the name of "independence and reform."

Subsequently to that time the company was driven out of the mine, and shortly after they left this judge took possession of the company's property. In a short time his daughter married the "boss miner," Granger, and a little while later the property was denounced in the name of that son-in-law. Those parties are said to be holding and working the mine to-day. The circumstances justify the conclusion that this conspiracy began with that Mexican judge and his daughter and that "boss miner," Granger.

SOME AFFIDAVITS.

Now I propose to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to some affidavits taken in the city of New York, which will show that the agent of Mexico had engaged in the very disreputable practice of attempting to procure false statements of Exall. I hold in my hand the affidavit of Mr. Ely, a prominent and reputable lawyer of the city of New York, who has been counsel for the La Abra Company, who knows Exall well and who knew him when he was engaged as superintendent for this company. Mr. Ely states in his affidavit that he was informed by Exall of a proposition made to him by a New York detective by the name of Weed, who called in the interest of the Mexican government to get from Exall testimony to show that the award in favor of the La Abra company was fraudulent, and said that such testimony as would accomplish that result would be worth $20,000 to Exall. I shall not read the entire affidavit. The gist of it is that Exall was offered $20,000 to furnish the requisite evidence to defeat the La Abra claim, and that Exall's further intercourse with the detective was through George W. Kittelle, who acted as Exall's friend. I hold in my hand also the affidavit of Mr. Exall, who states that so much of Mr. Ely's affidavit as relates to him is true. He states also that with Weed, one Thomas Fisher, who claimed also to be a detective, was co-operating to procure from him the evidence, and that he received a letter from Fisher, which is given in the affidavit, seeking an interview with him before the arrival of the Mexican minister, who was then daily expected in New York. I have also an affidavit of Mr. Kittelle, who acted as the friend of Exall in the matter, who had interviews on this subject with both detectives, Weed and Fisher. Kittelle was informed by Fisher that if the required evidence from Exall should conflict with the evidence he had already given he need have "no apprehension on that point," as he would be "kept harmless and protected by the parties behind them, who were very strong." Those parties were represented to be Mr. Lines, a Washington attorney, General Slaughter, also at Washington, and Mr. Zamacona, the Mexican minister.

I commend these affidavits to the careful examination and consideration of the gentleman from Mississippi. I think he will find them to contain interesting reading matter.

But this is not all, Mr. Speaker. I hold in my hand the affidavit of Thomas J. Bartholow, accompanied by copies of letters from A. B. Elder, of Mexico, inclosing to Bartholow correspondence between Elder and R. B. Lines. I shall not detain the House by reading at length these affidavits. The point of them is that Mr. Lines wanted the evidence of Elder to be used against the La Abra award. Elder represents that he asked $10,000 to furnish the evidence in behalf of Mexico, and that he was offered within $1,500 of his price. The correspondence from Mr. Lines shows that his agents are in communication with Exall, of New York, who is "weakening very rapidly." It will be observed that General Bartholow states in his affidavit that one of the letters inclosed to him by Elder is an original letter written by Mr. Lines.

I have at my desk also affidavits of James C. Reed and William G. S. Clarke, made at Mazatlan, Mexico, stating that one Alfred A. Green, who also had a claim before the mixed commission, which was rejected by Sir Edward Thornton, had gone to Mexico in search of evidence to defeat the La Abra award. He was anxious to find two witnesses who were not particular as to what they swore to. If they would make such affidavits as he would prepare, he would pay well for them. He said he was financially embarrassed and the only hope he had of retrieving his fortune was to defeat the La Abra claim. He wanted white men for witnesses, as, in his opinion, the evidence of one white man was worth a dozen Mexicans.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House further by reading these affidavits which show such utter disregard for truth and honor on the part of those representing Mexico.

MEXICO'S NEW EVIDENCE.

Looking over this case in the light of all the evidence before us we see that a party of enterprising gentlemen went to Mexico, purchased a mining property, expended a large amount of money, and commenced a legitimate business. They were driven out of the country and their property was spoliated. A Mexican judge who had ordered them to abandon their property takes possession of it himself. His daughter is married to the mining boss and the property is denounced in his name. Now Mexico, shouting fraud, is seeking, if we believe the affidavits I have read, to suborn witnesses to protect herself from the payment of an award to a company she has wronged and robbed.

We are told that the attorney of Mexico offered evidence to the umpire, which she had failed to offer to the commissioners. The evidence so offered was rejected by the umpire. The learned and intelligent attorney of Mexico, Avila, knew very well that the umpire had no power to receive such evidence, because the treaty expressly provided that the evidence had all to be submitted to the two commissioners, one American and the other Mexican; that if they disagreed the papers were to be transmitted to the umpire, who was then to pass upon them. He had no authority to pass upon anything that had not been before the commissioners.

Right here I desire to call attention to a most interesting document. It is a copy from the State Department of the opinion of Commissioner Wadsworth in the Weil case. My purpose is to show the insincerity of Mexico in her offer to get additional evidence considered by the umpire. Both the Weil and La Abra claims are said to have arisen on Mexican territory, and therefore the Mexicans, of all others, are presumed to be familiar with the facts. Claimants had taken their evidence, or part of it, nearly five years before the cases were decided. Mexico had the fullest and fairest opportunity to refute anything that may have been proven by the claimants, and yet she failed to offer any proof for that purpose. The civil and military authorities were under her control. When the commissioners came to consider the Weil claim that excellent gentleman, Commissioner Wadsworth, prompted by the desire to do exact justice, which has so distinguished the American judiciary, having heard the insinuations of those representing Mexico that the claim was fraudulent, made distinct offers to the Mexican attorney to permit him to submit any evidence tending to defeat the claim. I read from the record of the State Department.

The commissioners having differed in opinion in this case, Mr. Commissioner Wadsworth delivered the following opinion:

In the face of so many witnesses of respectability I am unwilling to decide that the facts detailed by them are not true. I must decide upon the proofs and documents filed in the case, and nothing else. These remain without contradiction by the government (of Mexico.) And to remove all misapprehension, I state that I am willing to give every opportunity in my power, as a commissioner, to the government to make a full and ample investigation of the claims, and respond to it, and very much hope that this might be done. But as this is declined, I must act on the proof before me. It is now my decision that the United States must have an award for the value of the property at the time and place of its seizure without interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why do you suppose that that liberal offer of the distinguished American commissioner was declined by Mexico? Why did Mexico not offer her evidence? It was for the reason that the claimants would have the "opportunity to rebut it by new evidence," clearly implying that anything they might offer would be disproved.

Mr. KENNA. Is that their statement?

Mr. WILSON. That is the statement of Commissioner Zamacona. Now, sir, by the treaty between these two high contracting parties, it was agreed that whatever those awards might be, they should be final and binding, and each Government pledged to the other its integrity to carry them out without any purpose of evasion or delay whatsoever. After this offer by Commissioner Wadsworth, Mexico is clearly estopped.

Now, sir, imagine a man in one of the American courts where a case is being tried involving his liberty or his property. He goes before the judge and says: "The evidence here on the part of the State"—or the opposing party—"is tainted with fraud and corruption." The judge magnanimously rules, as his love of justice and his desire to do right prompts him, he will not try this case now, but will give the party complaining a day in court, and will allow him to come prepared to protect his property or his life, as the case may be. But the party says to the judge: "No, Mr. Judge; I will not offer any evidence, because the other side will have the opportunity to show that my witnesses are not to be relied upon; proceed and deliver your judgment and I will take my chance for equity and justice somewhere else hereafter."

I have been practicing law a long time, and in all the course of my practice I have never seen an act by a judge on the bench that I thought was more impartial, more honorable, more lenient, and better calculated to give a party every possible opportunity for a fair trial than the act of Commissioner Wadsworth.

The gentleman from Mississippi asked me awhile ago what induced me to say that he had made statements outside of the case. I refer to his observations concerning matters occurring in his experience in the confederate army. He spoke about the overland route, about the want of water on that route, and about other things that do not enter into this case and are not even to be found in the pamphlet of General Slaughter.

I very much regret that at this late hour of the night I am called upon to say anything more. I will take but a few moments longer. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] makes a point of the fact that this La Abra Company did not present their books and accounts and such other records as it may have had, when they offered their evidence to these commissioners. Now, the fact was that they had been chased out of Mexico by the military; their mines had been seized and their books had been captured and could not be obtained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KENNA. Unless some other gentleman is entitled to the floor, I will take the floor and yield to my colleague such time as he may desire to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WILSON. I have but one or two more points to make. Before I forget it, I desire to say that the Senate bill referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] is the same as the House bill, except the fifth section. That section of the Senate bill requires these two claims of the La Abra Mining Company and Weil to be suspended for six months. If fraud is not then found to exist they are to be paid.

Now, I desire to say that I have it from the lips of Judge DAVIS, who reported that bill to the Senate, that he examined no part of the evidence; that he is utterly uninformed as to what the evidence is in this case. And I undertake to say that if that distinguished gentleman had been informed what the evidence was he never would have reported that bill.

The Senate bill provides, I presume upon the strength of this Slaughter pamphlet, that these two claims shall be held up and all the other claims paid. The House bill provides that the entire matter shall be remitted to the Executive. It belongs to him.

If Mexico is entitled to relief, the President has ample power to grant that relief. But, more than that, I have a copy of a letter from the State Department to the diplomatic representative of Mexico. I shall not take time to read it; but in it the Secretary of State says that if this matter goes back to the executive department he will take particular care to examine the questions presented.

Mr. Speaker, as far back as 1831, by a treaty between this Government and Mexico each pledged "special protection to the persons and property of citizens" of the other in their respective territories. On her part how has that pledge been fulfilled?

We have but to turn to the history of the wrongs and outrages committed by her depredatory bands upon our people. Mexico has not kept faith toward us, and our policy toward her has been criminally indulgent.

What is the relation of the two governments to-day? Cast your eyes to the far-off border on the Rio Grande. From along that border comes up from our citizens the cry of robbery and invasion by Mexicans. But that is not the worst: there comes up the still more startling cry of murder.

Mr. Speaker, while the diplomatic representatives of Mexico are "appealing to the sense of equity and justice" of the American people here at Washington, Cortina's band of Mexicans are cutting the throats of our citizens on the border. If these invasions shall not be discontinued; if the robbery and murder of our citizens shall not be arrested; if our treaties with that republic shall not avail to preserve our lives and property in our own country, it will become the duty of this Government to call our war-worn veterans of the late war from both armies from their retirement, and they will march across that border and conquer a peace that will be as permanent as the everlasting hills.

I quote from a speech recently delivered in the Senate of the United States, by Hon. S. B. MAXEY, a Senator from Texas:

> On the night of the 11th of August last, about the hour of midnight, an armed band of Mexicans, organized upon the soil of Mexico, crossed the Rio Grande, the boundary between Mexico and the United States, broke open the jail of Starr County, Texas, released therefrom two prisoners—one confined for murder and the other for horse-stealing—shot the jailer and his wife, and also the county attorney, and triumphantly carried these prisoners, thus released, from the soil of the United States to the soil of Mexico.

To show the sentiment that operated upon the Mexican congress when the question of abolishing the Free Zone—that long, narrow strip of country into which goods were imported duty free and which operated greatly to the prejudice of this Government, in this: that it encouraged smuggling—and to show the hostility of that government to this, I read from the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the Mexican border trouble:

> The delegate Ramon Guzman, referring to the American complaints, said (Appendix, p. 313) "They argue [meaning the Americans] that the maintenance of the Free Zone is a serious detriment to their views for the future, and that fact speaks louder in its favor than anything my feeble voice can utter."

And to still further show the hostility of Mexico, I read from the correspondence between her minister of foreign affairs and Mr. Foster, representative of this Government:

> Mr. Vallarta, the Mexican minister of foreign affairs, touched the true key of our relations with Mexico when he stated to Mr. Foster (Appendix, p. 455) "that the enforcement of its constitutional guarantees ought not to be expected of Mexico with the same strictness as of the United States; and that it was not just to require Mexico to base its treaties with foreign nations upon the principle of reciprocity, and that the United States should not expect Mexico to guarantee the same rights to its citizens which the United States are able to give to Mexicans."

Mr. HANNA. For what reason?

Mr. WILSON. I am going to tell you: "because the circumstances of the two countries are so entirely different."

This paper, Mr. Speaker, I characterize as the most vicious and reprehensible paper that I remember to have seen in any diplomatic correspondence between two friendly powers. But, sir, this is not all. I read the following inflammatory and warlike article, taken from the New York Herald, from the pen of Escobedo, the right-hand man of Lerdo, the late president of Mexico:

> The following extract from the Conciencia Pública, a journal published in the City of Mexico shortly after the execution of Maximilian, contains the desired intelligence, and perhaps a little over. Read and ponder over the words of General Escobedo when out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spoke. The letter is addressed to Governor Gomez, of Nuevo Leon:
> "The execution of the traitors, which I had the satisfaction of directing, is good food for digestion. It will satisfy the Europeans and the Yankees too that to trifle with Mexicans is death by the law. Had we complied with the request of the Yankees to spare the filibustero and his associate traitors it would have been taken for cowardice, and the next thing would have been a request to give up our lands, our mines, and our women. After this we shall be allowed to worship our own God, till our own soil, work our own mines, and not have our women defiled by Yankee libertines.
>
> "I am now in favor of making clean work of the detested gringos. This country belongs to God and us, and just so long as one foreigner remains on our soil our liberty is in jeopardy. By every means in our power we should make the country Mexican, and as all the property in the hands of foreigners was made by our misfortunes, we should take it, now that we have the power, and hunt them from the country. My motto now is, Death to all estrangeros.
>
> "There is no danger of the Yankees interfering with us so long as the Southern States (Estados del Sur) are kept out of the Union; besides the black men would side with us, and may at any time pronounce against the whites. Before we get through with the foreigners the Yankees will think we are in earnest, and the time will come when their notables will be begging for their own heads instead of begging for the Austrian.
>
> "In our struggles for liberty we have lost nearly all. Our lands and our mines and our liberty and our women and our honors we still have, but the foreigners have all the available wealth of the republic; but they will see in less than three years that Mexicans will have what they want in Mexico. You will understand from this my position, and should I by any chance whatever become a candidate you will understand my unalterable platform. Whenever the time comes you can make this letter public in such manner as you think proper. I know that you and I think alike on these matters, and I know that our countrymen will applaud our patriotic determination.
> "God and liberty!
> "ESCOBEDO."

I commend this article to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] who lays the Mexican question so near his heart and espouses her cause so eloquently on this floor. "Death by the law" is the protection offered by her to the American Yankee.

Mr. Speaker, we now have to keep an army along the Texan border to protect the lives and property of our people against the cut-throat bands who infest that border. It has been arranged, I believe, to keep five thousand soldiers in that service.

I have received from the Secretary of War within the last few days a letter in which he says that to keep an army of that size on that border will cost this Government over $4,000,000 annually. What do members of this House think of the idea, in these times of distress and want, of taxing their constituents at the rate of four millions of dollars annually to protect our border citizens from our Mexican neighbors whose cause the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] advocates here to-day.

Mr. Speaker, our policy toward Mexico has been child's play. Our Government has been insulted by her, our border has been invaded by her desperadoes, and our people have been butchered by them. It is the high duty of this Government to compel Mexico to keep the peace and be of good behavior, at least toward us.

Less than two years ago a German consul, if I remember rightly, was insulted and assaulted in Nicaragua. Germany proposed no treaty, no mixed commission, but sent one of her ships of war to Nicaragua and under the menace of its guns that government paid or agreed to pay $30,000 and was humiliated by having to salute the German flag.

If this Government will be as exacting and as determined with Mexico as Germany was with Nicaragua, we can disband our Army on the border and save to the people of this country the millions of dollars we draw from them by taxation to support that Army, and our border citizens will be safe in their frontier homes; but until some such policy shall be pursued we shall have no peace with Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill and House bill are the same, except the fifth section. The fifth section of the House bill proposes to remit the whole question to the executive department, where it properly belongs. The Senate fifth section virtually directs that the Weil and La Abra claims be suspended for six months. This, I conceive, we have no authority to do. We have no more authority to instruct the President what he shall do upon this subject than he has by special message to instruct this House how to vote. As stated by Story on the Constitution, the President is the immediate author and finisher of all treaties, and I hope never to see this House overstep the boundary-line that separates the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

But there is another point. Various petitions have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs by American claimants whose claims were rejected by the Mexican commission.

It is alleged by some of them, and notably by the Rosario and Carmen Mining and Manufacturing Company of California, that they had fully proven their claims by reliable and competent evidence; but that their proof was destroyed or purloined by Mexicans, and that the defensive evidence by Mexico was tainted with perjury. Now, sir, if Mexico asks equity, she must do equity. If she wants a rehearing of an award against her because of fraud and perjury, she must submit to rehearing of an award in her favor if her agents and witnesses have been guilty of fraud and perjury.

Mr. Speaker, I hope members will not lose sight of the fact that the money paid over under these awards and that to be paid hereafter does not belong to this Government. It belongs to our citizens to whom it was awarded. Upon the rendition of those awards the rights of those citizens to that money became vested—as clearly vested as the right of any citizen can be to any property. After the execution of this international contract, and before the awards were rendered, I admit that it would have been competent for the two high contracting parties to change or abrogate that contract; but after the object for which the commission was created had been accomplished, the rights of citizens ascertained and vested in the amounts awarded to them, neither this House nor the Executive can do any act to defeat or overthrow those awards without violating that familiar provision of our Constitution in reference to the obligation of contracts.

I thank the House for its courtesy.

Mr. KENNA. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation of $500 for each year that the late Professor Henry was employed as a member of the Light-House Board, for the benefit of his family; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Quartermaster-General, submitting an estimate of the cost of acquiring title to and inclosing lands in which confederate prisoners of war were buried, and of erecting headstones over their graves; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of David Wilcox & Co. and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, engaged in the manufacture of black silk hats, praying for the abolition of the duty on hatters' black silk plush, or its reduction to not more than 10 per cent. ad valorem; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Hon. B. H. Bristow, Hon. James Speed, and others, citizens of Louisville, and other citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of an act providing for greater telegraphic facilities between the United States and other countries; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I present the petition of George W. Davis and others, citizens of Toledo, Ohio, who represent that "the vast interests involved in the maintenance of telegraphic communication between the United States and the rest of the world require the utmost facility to be given therefor, and your honorable bodies are therefore earnestly requested to reject all applications for exclusive privileges and to pass a law giving permission to any and all persons and companies, without preference, to land telegraphic cables on the shores of the United States, and through them to keep up telegraphic communication between this and other countries." As a bill on this subject has been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations and is now, I believe, upon the Calendar, I move that this petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4550) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Moore, of the State of Virginia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 977) to relieve the political disabilities of John Green, sr., of Alabama, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1638) to remove the political disabilities of Albert Miller Lea, of Navarro County, Texas, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of H. A. Edmundson, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 1362) for the removal of the political disabilities of H. A. Edmundson, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should like to have that bill passed now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President. I know that it is perfectly right, but justice to all the others requires that it must take its fair chance.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should like to have them all passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So would I, but I do not believe it is right to consider a bill when it is first reported from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1052) to remove the political disabilities of William W. Loring, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of E. Kirby Smith, of Tennessee, praying the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 1363) to relieve the political disabilities of E. Kirby Smith, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William P. Smith, presumably of Washington, (his residence is not given but his petition is dated at Washington,) praying for the removal of his political disabilities, to report favorably, with an accompanying bill to effectuate the object of the petition.

The bill (S. No. 1364) to remove the political disabilities of William P. Smith was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state that there is a large number of other bills and petitions praying for similar relief in the Judiciary Committee, in respect of all of which there is one or another difficulty, some in respect of indebtedness due the United States, one or two where there is no petition, and so on, and if gentlemen interested in these several bills and petitions will take the trouble to go to the committee-room they will see exactly how each case is situated, and can provide for the rectification, so far as it may be.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War transmitting the petition of Lewis Leffman, ordnance sergeant United States Army, praying for his retirement with the full pay of his grade, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to Governor Hubbard, of Texas, such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the volunteers of the State at their summer encampment, to report it favorably. The encampment is soon to take place and there is a necessity that the joint resolution should be passed immediately. I ask that it be put upon its passage. It is exactly similar to every other case where we have loaned tents in furtherance of the military spirit of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it must go over like everything else.

Mr. MAXEY. It is important to act upon it at once, because the encampment is soon to take place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not object to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5063) for the relief of Daniel S. McDougal, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Spaugh, praying to be reimbursed the sum of $750, the proceeds of a certain note of which he was the principal maker, confiscated and sold under a decree of the United States district court for the district of Indiana, and bid in by himself and subsequently recovered against himself by the payee thereof, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1366) for the relief of Robert Spaugh.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1183) to authorize the extension of the patent of Levin P. Clark, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Ann Jones, praying for the passage of an act to enable her to apply for an extension of patent No. 32135, April 23, 1861, granted to Alfred C. Jones, for an improved pipe-coupling, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 861) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries, have instructed me to report it back with a very slight amendment and recommend its passage. Inasmuch as the bill has been read once at length, and there are only two words to be added, I ask that the bill may be considered at the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill and the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to oppose the bill, but I should like to suggest to the Senate that after the morning business we proceed with the Calendar under the Anthony rule for the remainder of the morning hour which is extended one half hour to-day.

Mr. OGLESBY I have morning business to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Several Senators have risen with morning business.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that after the morning business is received we proceed with the Calendar regularly. I do not wish to interfere with this bill now that it has been read at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill raises a very important question as to where the dividing line is between State and national authority in respect of the shores of the sea. It is a matter which I should like to think of a little before I vote for or against the bill, and if it will not do any great harm I wish my friend would let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking my friend to let it go over until to-morrow, because it involves a very important question that I wish to consider in regard to my own vote upon it. I am sorry otherwise.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator asks to have the bill go over of course I must not object, but I want to remind him now that the only way in which I can get the floor to move a bill at all is under the rule which authorizes me to report it from a committee. I hope to have his assistance, therefore, to-morrow in order to get up the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend's position is exactly like that of all the rest of us. We cannot all get what we want at once. If we could take the Calendar up in order we should get on somewhat with business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin insist upon the consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. He cannot.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot, and I would not if I could.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1367) to aid in the protection of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 780) to provide for indemnity to the States under the acts of Congress approved March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, relating to swamp and overflowed lands, to report it with amendments in the nature of a substitute, with the following title: "A bill to extend the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1855, entitled 'An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, and for other purposes.'" I will state that I have not yet prepared a report to accompany this bill, but will do so at a future day and file it, to accompany the bill hereafter. I ought also to state that while there are some members of the Committee on Public Lands who do not care to submit any minority report, they probably will care to oppose in some method or other the bill, or, if not the entire bill, some of its features. I think I should state that for the benefit of members of the committee who have some views about this matter that they wish to present. I do not know that it is a bill that I shall urge the Senate to consider to the exclusion of appropriation bills; I am very sure I shall not. I would not ask to take up a bill of this character so as to hinder necessary public business in advance of it; but I ought to press it in the interest of those people who take a deep interest in this swamp-land question and in the legislation which we deem necessary to put in proper shape, and especially the persons who have located swamp lands in the various States and taken them from the States, that they may have their titles secured, and at the same time that the States which gave up those lands may receive indemnity certificates in lieu of the lands. That class of people of course take a large interest in the measure, but generally I do not know that the country would be particularly anxious about it. Therefore at present I shall not press the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill in relation to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, &c. I wish to state that this is a bill to create a sinking fund of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, and is identical in its provisions with the provisions of the act which has passed Congress in relation to the Central and Union Pacific Railroad Companies, with the necessary alterations in respect to amount. The bill ought to be passed at this session. It is not opposed, but on the contrary is favored by the company itself. Under the circumstances, as soon as the bill shall have been printed, I will ask the Senate to take it up for consideration.

The bill (S. No. 1368) in relation to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company and to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War recommending that when another appropriation is made for the publication of the Official Records of the Rebellion provision be made for the rent of an office, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 762) for the relief of C. T. Eubanks, successor of the firm of Eubanks & Anthony, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1369) to encourage and aid the higher education of the colored race in the District of Columbia and in the several States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KIRKWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1370) for the relief of James M. Bacon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 36) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Winterset, Madison County, Iowa, four cannon and carriages for the soldiers' monument in said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I rise to a personal explanation and a question of privilege. I feel that I owe a duty to myself as well as to the Senate, which, however unpleasant, I cannot, in justice to either, further postpone or omit.

The newspapers, published here and elsewhere, contain reports of statements, made under oath in another place in reference to myself, which are calculated to reflect upon my character and standing as a member of this honorable body.

These statements appear to be designed to establish—

First. That I was in some way connected, by participation or encouragement, in the perpetration of alleged frauds in the presidential election in 1876 in Louisiana, at or about the time of the canvass and return thereof.

Second. That I was party or privy to promises of protection and reward to officers charged with duties in connection with that election, and the returns thereof, made in consideration of frauds and perjuries, committed or to be committed by them, in reference thereto.

Third. That having subsequent knowledge of such frauds and of such promises, for the purpose of concealing the former, by assisting in the execution of the latter, I used my personal and official influence to procure, for James E. Anderson, official employment in the executive department of the Government.

To each of these accusations, whether expressed or implied, I reply by an emphatic denial.

I deny that I was connected in any way, by participation or encouragement, by knowledge, consent, or connivance with any frauds, real or pretended, in the Louisiana election.

I deny that I was party or privy to any promises of protection or reward to any one, in consideration of the commission by them of any frauds, real or pretended, in that election.

I deny that I made efforts to procure an official appointment for Mr. Anderson with the knowledge or belief on my part that he or any one else had been guilty of any fraud in connection with that election or in fulfillment of any promise of reward that had been made to him on that or on any consideration whatever.

On the contrary, I assert upon my honor as a Senator, which I am prepared to maintain upon my oath—

That I do not know and never have believed that any such frauds were in fact ever committed.

That I do not know that any promise was ever made to Anderson, or any one else, in consideration of fraudulent services in connection with the presidential election. Anderson, in my little intercourse with him, all which has taken place since March 4, 1877, never asserted, expressly or by any innuendo, that Mr. Sherman, or any one else, had ever promised him office or anything else, either for doing wrong or right, and never asked anything from me or through me by virtue of any such promise.

On the contrary, Anderson expressly and passionately appealed to me on the sole ground that he had rendered honest, honorable, lawful, and efficient service to the republican cause in Louisiana, at the sacrifice of time, and money, and peril to his life; and that he had for that cause incurred odium and hostility from political opponents.

The only wrong I understood or believed him to be guilty of was in having, previously, untruly pretended that he had been guilty of the things he now again pretends to confess. That wrong I had no information of until after his appeal to me for my aid had been responded to by an offer of my good-will in his behalf. His disclosure of it, with the delivery of the false documents which constituted it, I supposed was intended by him, and was regarded by me, as the atonement for and undoing of it. Upon that footing only I received it; it never for a moment occurring to me that the possession of them by me could be misconstrued into an offense, and believing that the only use which their publication could serve would be to propagate a mischievous and scandalous falsehood.

The only error, if there be one, of which I am conscious, is in having recommended to office a person who had meditated and prepared a wrong, but had, as it appeared to me, withdrawn from performing it.

But, as there seems to be an attempt to magnify it into one link in what is alleged to have constituted a conspiracy against important public rights; and as the coloring thus sought to be given to my conduct affects my standing and character in this honorable body, I consider it a matter of privilege that the Senate should inquire into the subject as affecting it not less than myself.

I have the honor, accordingly, to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed to inquire into and consider all things touching the matter stated and referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] and the events connected therewith, and particularly what connection, if any, that Senator had with any real or pretended frauds or other wrongs committed in the conduct and returns of the election in the State of Louisiana in 1876, and with any promises of protection or reward, if any, made by any one to one James E. Anderson, or others, in consideration of, or connection with, any official conduct by said Anderson or others, in relation to said election or the returns thereof; and into all the circumstances of any recommendation by the said Senator of the said Anderson for appointment to office; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a clerk and stenographer, and have leave to sit during the recess.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By the Chair, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will appoint the committee. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

JAMES M'GREGOR.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 888) for the relief of James McGregor.

Mr. WALLACE. What has become of House bill No. 923, relating to the bark Caldera, which was under consideration yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It fell with the expiration of the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. WALLACE. The Journal does not so show. It shows that it went over until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It could not go over until to-day, being considered within the morning hour. If the Journal shows that it did, it is incorrect.

Mr. WALLACE. That is what the Journal states. The bill being under consideration then the Journal shows that its consideration was postponed until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the ordinary order, to postpone until to-morrow, but the bill fell with the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin should yield to this bill, which was postponed temporarily yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order under the rule.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the regular order?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not demand the regular order until this bill, the consideration of which I have moved, is taken up.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from Missouri had better withdraw the call. There are other matters that can be attended to without delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri calls for the regular order——

Mr. COCKRELL. I do that in the interest of business. If we take up the Calendar I think we can soon run through with the unobjected cases. Almost every Senator has some case on the Calendar that he is exceedingly anxious to have called up and passed; and we are constantly antagonizing each other with these different bills. We can run through with the Calendar and then take up these special cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would remind the Senator from Missouri that the regular order will be resolutions, and will not be bills on the Calendar within the morning hour. Therefore the Senator from Missouri will not reach his object by calling for the regular order. The morning hour has been extended half an hour, and it will be devoted to morning business unless a Senator moves to go on with the Calendar. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] has indicated that he will make such a motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I make that motion, that we proceed with the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have moved to take up a certain bill. The Senator from California now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar. Does the motion made by the Senator from California take precedence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin takes precedence. The Senator from Wisconsin moves the present consideration of the bill which he has indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 888) for the relief of James McGregor. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James McGregor $603.11 for services rendered by him at the Malheur Indian agency, Oregon, during the fiscal year 1874.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, on the 24th of April, 1878:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 888) for the relief of James McGregor, has considered the same, and make the following report:

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay James McGregor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $603.11, in full for services rendered by him at the Malheur Indian agency, in the State of Oregon, during the fiscal year 1874.

Your committee addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, including a copy of the bill, with a request that he furnish for the use of the committee copies of all papers, vouchers, and proceedings on file in his office touching said claim.

In reply, the Commissioner furnished the papers asked for, and he states that the records in his office show that the claimant, James McGregor, was an employé at the Malheur agency in Oregon, during the year 1874, at a compensation of $1,200 per annum and seventy-five cents per day for subsistence.

The Commissioner transmits to the committee a copy of the account of McGregor, showing that the sum of $603.11, without interest, is due him.

The agent had no funds in his hands to pay McGregor, and he therefore gave him three certificates or vouchers, one for $44.92, one for $105, and one for $456.67.

The law regulating the drawing of these certificates or vouchers requires that they be drawn in triplicate. They were not so drawn, and, consequently, when they were presented to the Commissioner for payment, payment was refused, and the vouchers, after some delay, were returned to the agent in order that they might be properly drawn.

The original vouchers were destroyed by the agent, and they were properly drawn in triplicate and forwarded to the Commissioner by McGregor from San Francisco, July 31, 1875. They were allowed by the Commissioner at $603.11; but in the mean time the appropriation out of which the vouchers were payable had been exhausted, and they could not be paid. The amount now due McGregor is $603.11, the same being the amount appropriated by this bill. We recommend that the passage of the bill be concurred in by the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWIN R. CLARKE.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. No. 793) for the relief of Edwin R. Clarke. It will take but a moment, and will involve no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army by promotion in the line are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act, and only so far as they affect Edwin R. Clarke; and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said Edwin R. Clarke, late second lieutenant of the Tenth Regiment of United States Infantry, to the same grade and rank of second lieutenant held by him on the 12th day of July, in the year 1876, in any vacancy occurring in the grade of second lieutenant in said regiment: Provided, however, That no pay, compensation or allowance whatever shall ever be given to said Clarke for the time between said 12th day of July, A. D. 1876, and the date of the appointment hereunder: And provided further, That the acceptance of any benefit under this act by said Edwin R. Clarke shall be taken and construed to be, by his election, a bar to any claim for pay or allowances from the date of his discharge to his acceptance of a commission, if one be granted him under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. MERRITT.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 984. It is a meritorious bill, reported by the Committee on Claims, and will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 984) for the relief of William H. Merritt was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William H. Merritt, late register of the Fort Dodge land district of Iowa, of $3,600 for extraordinary clerk hire and clerical services in his office from the 1st of November, 1855, to the 1st of October, 1857.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES JOHNSON.

Mr. GORDON. I ask for the consideration of House bill No. 3284.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3284) for the relief of James Johnson, late collector of the port of Savannah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill releases the residue of the claim of the United States against James Johnson, late collector of the port of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, for moneys found due from him on the adjustment of his accounts as such collector by the Secretary of the Treasury, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to balance the account of Johnson by entering a memorandum of this release.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is there a report on that bill?

Mr. GORDON. There is.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, on the 31st of May last.

Mr. GORDON. Nobody calls for the reading of the report. The Senator from North Carolina merely inquired if there was a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that be the case, the report will not be read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHEEP HUSBANDRY IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. GORDON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be requested to submit to the Senate a report embracing such information as he may have obtained by recent circulars issued by him, and otherwise, in relation to sheep-husbandry and wool-production in the Southern States; and that he be further requested to embody in such report a paper on "Sheep husbandry in the South" prepared by Mr. John L. Hayes, secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, at the request of Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and others.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to take up Senate bill No. 763, which is simply to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado. It is not providing for a new judge but is local entirely. It permits the circuit judge in Colorado to appoint a term of court in the mining districts, which is absolutely necessary at the present time. There is an amendment by way of substitute for the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the circuit and district courts of the district of Colorado may, when the public interests require it, order a special term, to be held at such time and place as said courts may designate: Provided, That no special term of the circuit court shall be held except with the consent of the circuit judge of the circuit; that the circuit or district court may order a grand or petit jury, or both, to attend such special term, by an order entered of record at least thirty days before the day on which such special term shall convene. Notice of such special term shall be published weekly for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper published at the capital of the State. And when a circuit and district court shall be held at the same time and place, the same panel of jurors shall serve in both courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

F. W. GOLLADAY.

Mr. BECK. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4556) for the relief of F. W. Golladay.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $96 to F. W. Golladay, in full compensation for services rendered by J. E. Golladay, the minor son of F. W. Golladay, as an assistant doorkeeper from January 12, 1877, to March 1, 1877.

Mr. BECK. This has been concurred in by the committees of both Houses.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 576) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of imported merchandise.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL. The idea of construing boxes and trunks as vehicles, it seems to me, is a new departure. I suppose that the original act contemplated vessels and railroad cars. It strikes me that this bill will open a wide door for the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise. Certainly I should be unwilling to have this bill passed without an opportunity to look at it. I was not aware it was pending.

Mr. McMILLAN. I submit a motion to take up the bill. It has been on the Calendar for a long time; it has been passed over once or twice, and there has been ample opportunity for examining the bill. The Committee on Commerce reported it on the 11th of April last, and it is petitioned for by a large number of persons, and the petitions are on the Clerk's table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. I would rather it should go over until I have had time to examine the report and the bill. I am very sure that this is a new order of things, and it seems to me one wonderfully well calculated to promote any amount of smuggling.

Mr. CONKLING. Go over till when?

Mr. MORRILL. Till to-morrow.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will it lose its place?

Mr. HAMLIN. A motion can be made to take it up.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to have it disposed of now. It has been delayed long.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a question of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It is merely because I am pursuing knowledge under difficulties, that I should like to know what it is that a Senator should do or may do to enable him some time or other to get an opportunity to call up a bill? I have addressed the Chair a good many times; I did so several times before my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] and I discovered that other Senators have done the same thing before me and received precedence from the Chair. So I thought if I kept addressing the Chair I might eventually gain a hearing. Now my honorable friend gets up afterwards, and the Chair is about to recognize him. I want to find out, if I can, what we may do to come in in our proper turn during this morning hour to ask the Senate to take up a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to recognize all Senators at once. Quite a number are on their feet. Patience is all that is required. [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. I think the best way is to go to the Calendar.

Mr. McDONALD. That is the suggestion I have been trying to get the floor to make. Let us go through the Calendar regularly.

Mr. SARGENT. I think we had better go through the Calendar regularly.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have begged the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who is always very good to me, to give way for one moment, which I think he has agreed to do, while I ask the Senate to take up a bill which will take but a moment, which is reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance, which if it does not pass now may as well never pass at all this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

A bill (H. R. No. 1896) for the relief of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4988) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute superintendents of mints or assayers in assay offices assistant treasurers of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 134) making further appropriations for continuing the improvement of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to take up Senate bill No. 1350 to cure a mistake in an account growing out of a mishap to a dead officer.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 1350) for the relief of Chester A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. The committee has reported a substitute. I suggest that nobody wants to hear the original bill read.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was read, being to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the proper accounting officers be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow Chester A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, in the settlement of his accounts, a credit for the sum of $5,000, in gold coin, being a sum now charged to the collector, which was stolen or disappeared from the office of the then cashier of the custom-house at New York, January 21, 1876, without the default or negligence of said collector, or of the late William D. Robinson, cashier.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4931) to provide for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress in the State of West Virginia. It only has three lines in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came from the House to-day.

Mr. HEREFORD. The object of the bill is simply to allow the State of West Virginia for this year alone to hold her congressional election on the same day as the State election, so that when the Legislature shall meet this coming winter, if it chooses to change the State law to make it comply with the Federal law on the subject, which I hope it will, there will be no further trouble. This year unless this is done we must have two elections, one in October and one in November, the State election in October and the election for Congressmen in November. It will cost our State some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars. The same privilege has been granted to other States; and unless it is done now for us, the bill will go over I fear for the rest of the session. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate that this bill may pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this bill is not before the Senate, it is as good a time as any to make a speech and I should like to make a small one on the subject.

A bill of a similar character came here from the House within a short time respecting another State, which contains a provision—I do not know whether this contains it or not—that would go a good way toward having the effect, and would have the effect, to repeal all laws of the United States regulating the election and registration for members of Congress.

Mr. HEREFORD. This bill has nothing of the kind in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so people say of the other.

Mr. HEREFORD. If that is the sole objection——

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is not the sole objection, if the Senator will only be patient enough to hear me. We cannot tell until the bill is read, printed, and referred what it does really contain. I never heard of it before; but several bills of this character and several States in this attitude are now under consideration by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I suggest to my honorable friend, therefore, that he will not lose any time, and will be much more likely to have it right and fair all round, if he will let it take its ordinary course, and that committee will undoubtedly report that and all the other cases very soon. They can be all put into one bill if that is thought best, and all go together. I am not sure but that the State which I have the honor in part to represent is in the same attitude; I have forgotten exactly what the condition of our law now is; but certainly there are several others; there is Colorado, there is New Hampshire, and there is North Carolina I think, and so on, and I submit to him that it is not right to hustle a bill through in this way.

Mr. HEREFORD. As far as the other States are concerned that are in a like condition, I think they ought to be relieved for this year also; but if the bill is amended by adding other States, it has to go back to the other House, and between the two bodies the bill may fall. If the gentlemen who represent Colorado desire that change for this year for her, I hope it will be granted; and so as to other States. I see no end to be accomplished by referring this bill. There are only three lines in it, and it simply proposes that the privilege I have named be extended for this year, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to take the bill up and pass it at this time.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to direct my friend from West Virginia to one feature of the bill. I am very heartily in favor of his having it passed, but it strikes me that possibly the second section has a little more in it than he has thought. I will read the bill:

That on the second Tuesday of October, 1878, there shall be elected in each congressional district in the State of West Virginia one Representative to represent said State of West Virginia in the Forty-sixth Congress.

That is all very well; but now the second section says:

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

It does not say "hereby repealed so far as to permit this to be done," but it absolutely repeals them.

Mr. HEREFORD. It simply says "that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed." There is nothing in this act except to change the day of election.

Mr. BLAINE. But the act to regulate the general election of Representatives, fixing it on the first Tuesday of November, is inconsistent with this act.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is the only respect in which it is.

Mr. BLAINE. This bill says:

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

It does not say "are hereby repealed so far as to permit this to be done," but it absolutely repeals them. I can illustrate by the case that was up in regard to giving General Shields a position on the retired list. That bill said that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with it were thereby repealed so far as to permit this to be done; but it did not repeal the act limiting the retired list to three hundred.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have no objection to striking out the second section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator had better let the bill be printed and referred.

Mr. HEREFORD. We shall never get it reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have had such a bill four weeks before this committee and it has not been reported yet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator cannot get a report in four days, I will agree to vote with him to discharge the committee.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have had bills before committees for a month and could not get them reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They may be a good deal more difficult than this.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that I think the request of his State is entirely reasonable.

Mr. HEREFORD. If the Senator from Maine will move to strike out the second section I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being laid before the Senate? It has not yet been laid before the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be read by its title.

The bill (H. R. No. 4931) to provide for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress in the State of West Virginia was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from West Virginia will listen to me for a moment, I shall be glad to appeal to him. He knows just as well as the rest of us do, that this species of hasty legislation, however plain it may seem at the moment, is an unwise and unsafe method of procedure. Now, the Senator from West Virginia, saying this bill was clear of all possible criticism, the Senator from Maine has discovered a criticism which is entitled to a good deal of consideration. It may be that he is wrong about it, but it should be considered. I submit to my friend, therefore, to let the bill take the usual course, and so far as I am concerned, I will pledge him to do everything I can, if that committee is unreasonable at all in its delay about the bill——

Mr. HEREFORD. They have had it a month already.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator hear me a moment? If that committee is unreasonable on a bill of this kind which does not involve any principle, as I cannot conceive it will be, I will unite with the Senator, and no doubt everybody else will, to discharge the committee and then take up and act on the printed bill. I cannot consent to have this bill read the second time to-day unless it is read for the purpose of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second reading is objected to, and the bill goes over.

Mr. HEREFORD. If that is the end of the bill it is all I have to say.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I wish to say a single word in reference to the conduct of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to this bill. There has not been the slightest disposition to delay action on this bill, or any intention not to report it so that the Senate could act. There are various measures of this kind pending before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and some more are to come. Some of these measures have a political effect and some have not.

Now, in this case of West Virginia, I understand from the republicans of West Virginia that they are anxious to have this bill passed. There is a similar bill before the committee in reference to California where both parties desire that it shall pass; and that is true also in reference to some other States. I think that my friend from West Virginia is entirely wrong in the purpose which he attributes to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to any member of that committee, when he states or intimates that they desire in any way to prevent action upon this bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did not intimate that the committee had any obstructive disposition; I merely meant to intimate and to say that by non-action and the consideration of matters of greater importance they had not acted on it, although they had had it a month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: After some conversation with my honorable friend from West Virginia, I ask unanimous consent that the West Virginia election bill be read the second time and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. No. 4931) to provide for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress in the State of West Virginia, was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. SPENCER and Mr. RANSOM submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to morning business. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered by the Senate, each morning after the disposal of morning business the Senate will proceed to business on the Calendar and dispose of cases thereon under the Anthony rule.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to inquire how long the morning hour was extended this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour now extends for an hour and a half.

Mr. HOAR. What is the meaning of a rule of one member of the Senate as distinguished from a rule of the rest of the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. By a sort of common law of the Senate, by a general understanding, the Anthony rule is defined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the name given to an order submitted originally by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. SARGENT. It is an order printed on the first page of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been in force so long that it is distinguished by the honorable Senator's name.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I understand it, the proposition is to go to the Calendar and dispose of unobjected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the proposition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. SARGENT. Then objection being made to that, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California calls for the regular order.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. For nothing unless objection is withdrawn to this resolution, and I will stand to it, to go into effect to-morrow. This system is simply a system of favoritism——

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order, that we shall have order in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken; there is disorder in the Senate. Senators will please be seated.

Mr. SARGENT. The system which we have adopted this morning amounts to very little more than a system of favoritism. Senators are picked out here and there, or by louder voice or more persistency than others manage to make themselves recognized. It is entirely unjust to the body of the Senate. There are on this Calendar three or four bills that I am extremely anxious to have considered. I should like to enter into a competition, but, as one Senator near me said, he did not feel disposed to play leap-frog by the hour in order to get business in which he was interested before the Senate. There ought to be some fair and equitable plan by which cases that do not lead to long debate will be disposed of during the morning hour. The Anthony rule has been considered, after long experience in the Senate, fair and just to every Senator, and I propose by the resolution I have offered that after this morning we proceed regularly under that rule. My friend from Wisconsin objects. He has had his privilege this morning. He called up his bill by my yielding for it. He certainly cannot want to call up another bill. If so, he wants favoritism extended to him in preference to other Senators. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] has been trying for an hour to get up a bill, but failed, although Senators all around him, by some method which I do not understand, succeeded in getting up their business.

I do not desire to reflect on anybody, but on the system. The system is unfair, all depending on the strength of lungs of Senators or an undignified persistence vexing the ear of the Chair to get some preference for their business. It produces disorderly scrambles, so that you can scarcely understand what is going on; and bills are hurried through under this system which cannot have the deliberation that they ought to have. I have no doubt that we have passed bills this morning amounting in the aggregate to $100,000, and I doubt if there are many Senators who can give the names of those bills, and much fewer who can give the reasons why those bills ought to pass. Our action is simply taking the report of a committee, which may be a mere majority of a committee, haphazard on all these bills, without any examination by the Senate at all.

I propose that we proceed with the Calendar under the five-minute rule, which gives an opportunity, after the reports are read, for a statement of the character of the bill and a statement of objection; and after that, if the Senate sees fit to pass the bill, then it looks like legislation, and is legislation. Anything else is not worthy of the name.

For these reasons, and not desiring to exclude any Senator at all, I think I shall insist on my motion, and I intend to make the motion each morning unless we can have the rule I offer adopted so as to regularly proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there are a great many very excellent things, I think, contained in the rule to which the Senator from California has referred. It is not faultless; it is not free from objection. I will state one. If we act under that rule, we consider a subject, and after we shall have considered it for a time it is within the power of a single Senator to object, and over it goes, and we hear no more of it. Under that rule every other Senator, if you please, in this body but the simple objector, may be satisfied, and he has the power to stop its progress. In other words, it puts within the power of a single objection that which is superior to an overwhelming majority of the Senate. Now, there may be two cases upon this Calendar that may be objected to, which are equally meritorious to those that will pass unobjected, and when those cases are presented where there is strong merit and a large majority of the Senate are in favor of the measure, I do not believe that we ought to be confined to that rule which allows a single member thus to dispose of the business. But I will go with the Senator in doing anything we can to get out such cases and dispose of them as soon as we can.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that the suggestion of the Senator from California will prevail. I think, whatever may be the faults of the rule, nothing can be so faulty as the method we have adopted here this morning. I for one do not want to pursue the method I have been obliged to this morning, to try the strength of lungs in order to get the consideration of a bill. There is no other proper way but to take these things in order. If there be any defect in this rule I do not think it is applied practically so as to work any great injustice, but there is no getting on with the proper consideration of legislation without some such rule, and I really hope we shall not consume the time of the Senate in the morning hour any longer after to-day in a scramble such as we have seen to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed under the Anthony rule to the consideration of cases on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. McDONALD. I submit that Senate bill No. 501 is the first in the Calendar, as——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the Anthony rule the Senate commence where they left off, which will be with House bill No. 1855.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to state that this bill was once reported to the Senate and placed on the Calendar by a certain number. It was afterward recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and after some consideration before the committee it again was reported back and ordered to be placed upon the Calendar at its original number, so that it might not lose its place or position. I submit that that bill should stand first inasmuch as it was recommitted and was put back again by order of the Senate to take its place without loss of position; and it should stand as the first case to be now considered, this being the first call of the Calendar since it was restored.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asked that it be placed back at its original position, pending which the Senate moved on the Calendar and reached other cases subsequent to this. If that had not been ordered by the Senate to be restored to its original place, it would have taken its place when reported back by the committee. But the Chair will submit the question to the Senate under the circumstances.

Mr. McDONALD. The motion was not made by me, but by the Senator who reported it back from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the case named?

Mr. WITHERS. It is a patent case. It is not worth while taking that up, for I shall object to its being taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia objects and the case goes over. The first case on the Calender will be stated.

JOHN C. RAY.

The bill (H. R. No. 1855) for the relief of John C. Ray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to John C. Ray of $4,533.33, in full for services as pilot in the United States naval service during the late war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. SARGENT from the Committee on Naval Affairs on the 17th of April last, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. EDMUNDS. I have read this report myself, and I do not ask for a further reading. If nobody else wishes to hear it read, I will not take up the time. I have read it now myself.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to take up one bill from the Committee on Finance to which there will be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Regular order.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 942, that I may submit some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves to lay aside the regular order for the purpose of submitting remarks on the bill which he has named. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 942) entitled "A bill amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, on the 19th of March the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] reported from the Railroad Committee of the Senate the bill No. 942, amendatory of and supplementary to the several acts of Congress heretofore passed in relation to the Texas and Pacific Railway. On May 2d I introduced into the Senate the bill No. 1186, which also proposes to amend and supplement the acts of Congress referred to. The Railroad Committee of the Senate has reported this bill to the Senate, with some important amendments. These amendments, while they enlarge the scope of the bill, are in perfect harmony with its original purpose, recognize the soundness of the principle which pervades it, and are only intended to extend its beneficial effects. My purpose in addressing the Senate to-day is not so much to urge upon the consideration of Senators the importance of a southern line of railway between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean as it is to institute a comparison between these two bills as practical measures of legislation and to earnestly conjure Senators to take some action upon this subject now.

But, Mr. President, there is a question which lies at the threshold of this discussion, and it is this: Has Congress the power to deal with the franchises heretofore conferred upon the Texas and Pacific Railway Company and to divest that company of the land grant, or any part of it, heretofore made to it? The bill No. 1186 proceeds on the assumption that Congress has this power. In his argument before the Railroad Committee of the Senate and also in his argument before the House Committee on Pacific Railroads, which I have read with careful attention, the able and distinguished vice-president of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, Governor Brown, of Tennessee, emphatically denied that Congress has this power. Governor Brown based his denial of the power on what he claimed to be the plain meaning of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and of the amendatory act of May 2, 1872. Now let us see. The requirements of the act of March 3, 1871, on the subject of construction were superseded by those of the amendatory act of May 2, 1872, and it is not necessary to notice the act of 1871 further than to remark that it asserted a purpose on the part of Congress to reserve the right to do whatever might be deemed necessary to secure the speedy completion of the road.

The act of May 2, 1872, provides that—

> The said Texas and Pacific Railway Company shall commence the construction of its road at or near Marshall, Texas, and proceed with its construction * * * westwardly from a point near Marshall, and toward San Diego, in the State of California, on the line authorized by the original act, and so prosecute the same as to have at least one hundred consecutive miles of railroad from said point complete and in good running order within two years after the passage of this act, and so continue to construct each year thereafter a sufficient number of miles, not less than one hundred, to secure the completion of the whole line from the aforesaid point on the eastern boundary of the State of Texas to the Bay of San Diego, in the State of California, as aforesaid, within ten years after the passage of this act: Provided, however, that the said company shall commence the construction of said road from San Diego eastward within one year from the passage of this act, and construct not less than ten miles before the expiration of the second year, and after the second year not less than twenty-five miles per annum in continuous line thereafter between San Diego and the Colorado River, until the junction is formed with the line from the east at the latter point, or east thereof; and upon failure to so complete it, Congress may adopt such measures as it may deem necessary and proper to secure its speedy completion.

Governor Brown says:

> Upon the theory that Congress, or the courts can ever declare a forfeiture of this land grant, certainly no court would hold that this could be done until the lapse of ten years after May 2, 1872, the date of the amendment, which would give us until May 2, 1882, to earn our land grant by the completion of our whole line; and in the mean time, neither by the legislation of Congress nor by the adjudication of a court, can the Texas and Pacific Railway Company be deprived of that grant nor of any of its franchises as conferred by the act.

Again, he says:

> The event in which Congress may adopt other measures to secure the completion of the line is not in the failure of the company to build a certain number of miles per annum, as merely directed in the act, but it is upon its failure to complete the whole line in ten years, as clearly stated in the act.

The claim here made is, that this railway company, by the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and of May 2, 1872, was invested with a franchise and land grant which neither Congress nor the courts could take away for a period of ten years from the passage of the act, even though the company should have failed to construct one mile of road during all that time. The claim is good to this extent, or it is wholly fallacious. To speak plainly, such a claim is preposterous. Here is an application to Government for a franchise to build a transcontinental railway. It is alleged that the work is of national importance, and that the economical advantages to accrue to the Government from its speedy completion justify a liberal grant of the public lands to aid private capital in its construction. Congress admits the importance of the proposed work, and says to the company:

> You shall have a grant of the public lands. You shall have great and valuable franchises. But you must complete this work in ten years. And to give assurance of your good faith, and that the work shall be performed in the reasonable time prescribed, you shall build so many miles each year from the east toward the west, and so many miles each year from the west toward the east.

This is the brief history of the case, as it is found written in the statutes. Is Congress to be charged with the egregious folly of having contracted with the company to wait ten years before taking other measures to secure the completion of this line of railway, while declaring its purpose to secure its speedy completion, and this, though only five miles of road shall be built within that time? The question answers itself. There is no controversy here about facts. It is admitted that what Governor Brown calls the direction of the act of May 2, 1872, in reference to the number of miles of road to be constructed each year has not been complied with by the company. It is competent, then, for Congress to exercise its reserved power over the whole subject-matter. Whether it will do so or not rests wholly within its own discretion.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to consider the leading features of these two bills and their claims, respectively, to the favorable consideration of Congress and of the country. I shall speak plainly, both as to the merits of the bill No. 942 and of the whole question of a southern line of railway to the Pacific; and if I speak of persons toward whom the attention of the country has been directed, because of their prominent connection with this great industrial enterprise, it must not be supposed that I have the slightest inclination or purpose to thwart or to advance the personal ends or the individual ambition of any man, or that I have any part or lot in the rivalries and jealousies of railway magnates. There is a readiness on the part of the people and, I am sorry to say, on the part of the press of the country to impute improper motives to those whose duty it is to legislate on questions of this nature and of this magnitude. Every public man stands to-day in a light as fierce as that which beats upon a throne. For my own part, whenever duty seems to me to call, I shall speak my mind freely, and, if need be, earnestly, upon any question or measure of public interest without any fear that the people of the State which sent me here as one of her representatives will ever suspect me of acting in my place here upon any other than public considerations, and out of that regard for duty which it is to be hoped will ever, with the public men of our country, in the language of one of the most eminent of them all, "transcend all other regard."

The bill No. 942 proposes the construction of a single line of railway from Fort Worth, in Texas, by way of Fort Yuma, on the Colorado River, to San Diego, on the Pacific coast, a distance of about fourteen hundred miles. The bill provides that to furnish the company with the means to construct and fully equip this line of road the United States shall indorse a guarantee of interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the bonds of the company to the amount of $31,750,000. The interest on these bonds is to be paid semi-annually and the principal fifty years after date. But this is not the most striking feature of the financial plan proposed by the bill. Other bonds to the amount of $7,000,000, or $5,000 to the mile on the whole line of road, are to be issued by the company, and the interest in like manner guaranteed by the United States. Mr. President, I think the ordinary financial mind would be somewhat puzzled to conceive for what purpose this company could want money other than to construct and fully equip its road. But the construction and full equipment of the road is provided for by the guarantee of the interest on the $31,750,000. The bonds of the other series, amounting to $7,000,000, are to be sold by the United States—for what purpose? For the purpose of raising money to pay the interest as it accrues on the $31,750,000 of the bonds of the other series!

This is to make the Government party to a kiting operation. The company being unable to meet the interest on the construction bonds amounting to $31,750,000, thinks that by selling some more bonds and getting time it can in the future pay interest on $38,750,000 with more ease than upon the smaller sum. This is the device of men in difficulties. Being pressed for debt they meet it by putting their own paper on the market. The proposition is to protect and relieve the Government by making larger the annual interest it is responsible for.

Mr. Wilkins Micawber was fond of this mode of financiering, and no doubt the company took the hint from him.

But there is a provision of section 4 of the bill which may be thought by some to challenge equal admiration. In that section, beginning with line 67, will be found the following:

> That for the purpose of providing funds for the prompt completion of the work any of said bonds denominated issue A, to be used for constructing and equipping said road, the interest upon which is to be guaranteed as aforesaid, may be sold by said company in lots of from $2,000,000 to $10,000,000, the proceeds to be retained in the Treasury of the United States, to be paid over by the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, proportionately as the said railway and telegraph lines shall be constructed and completed, according to the provision of this act; and, until so required, such fund shall be invested, at current market rates, in United States bonds, such United States bonds to be sold from time to time and the proceeds of such sales delivered proportionately as sections of road shall be built, as hereinbefore recited; or, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Government shall allow interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on such cash deposits.

Now, Mr. President, is not this a most complicated and altogether remarkable arrangement? It is here provided that, in advance of the construction of any road, these bonds may be sold by the railroad company in blocks of from two to ten millions of dollars. What then? The proceeds in money of the sales of these blocks of bonds shall be retained in the Treasury until needed by the company to pay for constructed road, and until so needed the money shall be invested in United States bonds, which latter bonds shall be sold from time to time, and the proceeds of the sales delivered to the company as sections of the road shall be built; or, instead of purchasing United States bonds with the money received from the sale of the guaranteed bonds of the company, the Government shall pay 4 per cent. interest on the money, while it remains in the Treasury, if the Secretary shall prefer to do so.

I would like for some advocate of this bill to explain to the Senate what there is in the bill, with this provision standing in it, to prevent the company from selling the whole of the $31,750,000 within six months after the passage of this bill, and long in advance of the construction of the road. If the bonds were so sold in advance, there could be no earnings to respond to the demand for interest on the guaranteed bonds as it accrued; and the Government would have to pay the interest on the bonds of the company in the hands of purchasers, and also on the money, the proceeds of the sale of the guaranteed bonds deposited in the Treasury. I make no suggestion that there is room for a job in the provision that the railroad company may sell these guaranteed bonds in lots of two or five or ten millions, until the whole $31,750,000 are disposed of, for it is no part of my purpose to make any insinuation against the personal integrity of any of the officers of this company.

The people are taxed to pay annually, in round numbers, $98,000,000 interest on the bonds of the Government. Feeling what a vast burden this is and how it has borne us into the very earth and is keeping us there, we have been striving to reduce the annual charge by negotiating bonds at a lower rate of interest. We descended from 6 per cent. to 5, from 5 to 4½, from 4½ to 4, and are not without hope of getting still lower. But can this be expected if Congress agrees to indorse bonds amounting to nearly $40,000,000 at the rate of 5 per cent.? Our effort should be to get all public securities at as low rate of interest as possible and we should do nothing to interfere with or prevent this. But we do interfere with it most seriously if we agree to go the security of the company on the terms they propose. These bonds would absorb that much money which would otherwise be invested in United States four percents. The difference between 5 per cent. and 4 per cent. on $38,750,000 is $387,500 annually, and for the fifty years the bonds are to run would make $19,375,000, a sum not very far short of all that will be expended under bill 1186. The people are tired of bonds; they do not want any new ones. Let us pay what are out now, but issue no more.

There is another feature in this bill, Mr. President, to which I wish to direct attention. In section 3 of the bill, beginning on line 47, it is provided as follows:

That the Texas and Pacific Railway Company shall relinquish to the Government of the United States the grant of lands made to it for the construction of its line through the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and the State of California, except its road-bed and right of way two hundred feet in width, and sufficient ground for depots, stations, section-houses, water-tanks, turn-tables, aidings, &c., necessary for the construction and operation of its line, by the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes;" and shall relinquish all right to the reservation of the public lands made under and by said act, upon the express condition, and for the express purpose, that is to say, that the reservation aforesaid shall be opened to settlement by the Government of the United States, and the lands contained therein shall be sold by the Government of the United States at the prices usually affixed to the Government lands in railroad reservations; and the Government of the United States shall appropriate one-half of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in said reservation, including the odd and even sections thereof; first, to the payment of interest upon the bonds herein and hereby authorized to be issued by said corporation; and any surplus remaining, from time to time, of this one-half of the proceeds, after the payment of interest, shall be applied to, and made a part of, the sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds herein authorized to be issued; and if at any time there should remain a surplus of this one-half of proceeds of sale in the Treasury after paying any semi-annual installment of interest, such surplus shall be invested in the bonds of the company herein authorized to be issued: Provided, They can be secured at par, or such price above par as may be agreed to by said company; and if the company's bonds cannot be purchased at par, or at the price above par meeting the approbation of said company, then such surplus shall be invested in United States bonds until needed for the payment of future installments of interest, and, if not so needed, shall form a part of the permanent sinking fund: And provided further, That when the Texas and Pacific Railway Company shall accept the provisions of this act, that acceptance shall be made and taken as a full and complete relinquishment of the donation of lands heretofore made to said company by the act of March 3, 1871, for the purposes herein and hereby expressed, and upon the express terms and conditions herein set forth.

At the expense of being very tedious, Mr. President, I have quoted this whole section. I appeal to every Senator, is not this section likely to become the fruitful parent of controversies between the company and the Government? What does it mean? The lands contained in the reservation "shall be sold by the Government of the United States," says the section; but suppose obstinate and purblind American citizens should refuse to buy, what then? There is no limitation of time here within which anything shall be done; but it is stated with care and emphasis that the relinquishment of the reservation of the lands by the company is made "upon the express condition and for the express purpose" that the lands shall be sold by the Government, and that the Government shall appropriate one-half of the proceeds of the sales to the payment of the interest on the guaranteed bonds, &c. One-half of the proceeds of the sales of what? "One-half of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in said reservation, including the odd and even sections thereof," says this section of the bill. This is relinquishment with a vengeance. What, more or less, is this than to constitute the Government an agent for the transaction of the land business of this company at the Government's expense? And how long will it be before the agent will be called on to give an account of his stewardship? When this company shall be pressed to make provision for the interest on these guaranteed bonds, we may expect the response, "You took possession of my assets, and came under obligations to convert them into cash and to apply that cash to the payment of this interest; give me credit for the price at which you agreed to sell these lands or return them to me."

Mr. President, I hold one of two things to be certain: under the provisions of this bill the Government will either be required to credit this company with the value of these lands at the price agreed on, or to return the lands. For one I protest against any such entangling alliance with this company as is proposed in this section of the bill. The French have a proverb "that it is only the first step which costs." Let us not take this first step. If we do, in my judgment, the cost will be such that we shall be long in counting it. The smoke of one battle with corporations that feel themselves strong enough to try conclusions with the Government itself has scarcely cleared away from the Senate Chamber. If the Government accepts an agency from the Texas and Pacific Company for the sale of their lands, and assumes the obligation to make application of the proceeds, we may confidently look forward to other conflicts the issue of which may furnish less occasion for rejoicing than that of the one to which I have alluded.

And if these conflicts did arise, recollect that the Government assumes a responsibility for fifty years. A half century would not see them terminated.

This bill contains substantially the same provisions as to "earnings," "net proceeds," &c., which have given rise to so much trouble, litigation, and legislation in regard to the Central and Union Pacific roads. With that example before us, why should we repeat the experiment and voluntarily engage the country in and distract Congress with such struggles?

Mr. President, we must correct the errors and the omissions of the past as best we can, and I am not one of those, if there are any such, who would make our mistakes and the troubles that have grown out of them an excuse for declining to promote the development of the country by prudent legislation in the future; but surely the experience of the past invites circumspection; we should put no more acts upon the statute-books that are certain to be productive of future controversies here and of wearisome contests in the courts of the country.

There has been a great deal said by the gentleman who stands at the head of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, and by the advocates and promoters of this and other bills that have been introduced into Congress, about making the Texas and Pacific Railway "an open highway for the Government and the people." From much that has been said before the committees of Congress, in the press of the country, and in the corridors of this Capitol, we would be justified in concluding that this great enterprise has been undertaken and is to be prosecuted in a spirit of pure and unmixed benevolence; that there is nothing earthy about it. Let us see how true this pretension is. What are the provisions of the bill? In the eighth section will be found the following language:

SEC. 8. That the line of road constructed under the provisions of this act shall be maintained and operated by said company as an open highway, and as a postal and military route for Government purposes, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation for Government service, to be agreed upon and adjusted by the Secretary of War, the Postmaster-General, or the Secretary of the Interior, for their respective Departments in conjunction with the proper officers of the road, not exceeding the amounts paid by private parties for similar services, the Government at all times to have the preference in the use of the road and its facilities for the purposes aforesaid.

What sort of an open highway for the Government and the people is this? The road is to be maintained and operated by the company. The company shall receive fair and reasonable rates of compensation for Government service, which rates shall be agreed upon and adjusted by certain officers of the Government for their respective departments, in conjunction with the proper officers of the road, and the rates charged the Government shall not exceed the amounts paid by private parties for similar services. That is all there is in this much vaunted open highway as far as the Government is concerned. The Government shall pay fair and reasonable rates for every service rendered by the company, and in making a bargain as to rates the company has just as much power as the Government. Now, how is it about services to be rendered by this company to the people?

In the first section of the bill will be found the following language. I quote the whole of it, for it is very important:

Fair and reasonable rates for the carriage of through freight and passengers shall be agreed upon from time to time between the Texas and Pacific Railway Company and connecting companies, which shall not at any time exceed the rates charged by competitive Pacific railroad lines for similar business; but Congress shall at all times have the right to regulate rates for the transportation of such freight and passengers, and for postal and telegraphic service over the entire line of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, and over the entire lines of connecting companies claiming privileges under the provisions of this act, and may exercise a general supervision and control, so far as it shall be necessary so to do, in the interest of the Government of the United States, to secure prompt transportation for its own wants and for the public, and to protect the actual capital invested, and all liabilities of the Government for guarantee of interest made under this act.

I call upon Senators to scrutinize this language, and I think they will agree with me that it is intended to secure high rates for transportation instead of cheap rates. In the first place it relates only to through freights and passengers. Fair and reasonable rates for the transportation of through freights and passengers shall be agreed upon between this and connecting companies, and Congress shall have the right to regulate rates for the transportation of such freight and passengers, and for postal and telegraphic service, &c., and may exercise a general supervision and control—for what purpose? To secure prompt transportation for its own wants and for the public and to protect the actual capital invested and all liabilities of the Government for guarantee of interest made under this act. Now, two things are to be here observed: Congress is given no power whatever to interfere to regulate rates on local freights; and the right given to Congress to regulate rates for the transportation of through freights and passengers is given for a specific purpose, and that purpose is to protect the capital invested and the liability of the Government for guarantee of interest, and the power of general supervision and control given to Congress is to be exercised for two purposes: one is to secure prompt transportation for its own wants and for the public and the other is to protect the actual capital invested. There is not even a semicolon between the grant of the power and the specific definition of the purpose for which it is granted.

What is necessary to protect the capital invested? Of course the operating expenses of the road must first be deducted from its earnings. Then interest must be paid on all its interest-bearing obligations and a sinking fund must be created to pay the principal of the company's bonds when they mature. Now, I ask if the language of this bill does not imply a consent on the part of Congress that this company shall be permitted to fix rates that will produce revenue enough to enable the company to respond to the several demands which I have enumerated? And if, as is charged, rates on other Pacific railroad lines are exorbitant and oppressive, this bill gives this company also the right to make the same charges, because it says "rates shall not at any time be charged to exceed those charged by competitive railroad lines to the Pacific for similar business." This is a permission on the part of Congress to charge as much as the Central and Union Pacific roads do, especially if such charges are considered necessary to protect the capital invested and secure the Government.

Mr. President, I am endeavoring, to the best of my ability, to discharge what I believe to be a public duty. This bill seems to me to have been framed upon the idea that Congress would not scrutinize its provisions. I confess that I find it somewhat difficult to repress my indignation that Congress should be called on to consent to the provisions of this bill under the specious pretense of resisting monopoly and providing an open highway for the Government and the people. One great purpose of constructing this road is to develop the country through which it passes, to create new industries along its line, and to encourage the population of that vast territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific, which abounds in mineral wealth; where the labor of the agriculturist may find a rich reward, and where herds of cattle and sheep can be reared with less expense and consequently with greater profit than anywhere else on this continent.

It is more important to the people living near the line of this road that the rates of transportation on local freights should be moderate than that through freights should be carried at a low rate. The rate of transportation on through freights affects the people of the country indirectly. A high rate of transportation on local freights will affect every man living near the line of the road directly, and a high or moderate rate on what he produces and on what he consumes may make the difference to him and to his wife and children between comfort and poverty.

If at any time Congress should interpose to reduce the only freights it can interfere with—through freights—the reduction thus made will immediately be put upon local freights. What the company loses of income on the goods shipped from end to end of its road, it will make up on that transported only a part of the distance. The dollar taken off the box of goods from San Diego to the Mississippi River will be added upon the bale of cotton taken up at a way station. All this talk about an open highway and cheap rates finds no warrant in the provisions of this bill. And the pretense of giving Congress control over this road is a delusion and a snare, and cannot be too strongly condemned as a bold experiment upon our confidence.

Mr. President, I regard bill No. 942 as a positive menace to the commercial interests of the South—I mean to the States of Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, and Kentucky. It is well known that the president of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company has long clung with great tenacity to the idea of extending the Atlantic and Pacific road from Vinita, in the Indian Territory, to a point on the line of the Texas and Pacific road in the neighborhood of its intersection with the ninety-ninth or one-hundredth degree of longitude west. It cannot be doubted that this is a connection very much desired by the great Pennsylvania corporation at the head of which Colonel Scott stands. What southern man can fail to see that if the Government of the United States will furnish Colonel Scott with the means to build a through line from Fort Worth, in Texas, to San Diego, and thus give him control of freights from the Pacific coast and intermediate points eastward, he will find the means to make the Vinita connection, and thus have it in his power to divert freights from Galveston, New Orleans, and South Atlantic sea-ports, and haul them by way of Saint Louis over his Pennsylvania lines? The southern man who can vote for a bill that exposes the South to such a danger must have greater faith in Colonel Scott's purpose to do justice to the Southern States than I, as one of the representatives of a State on this floor, am willing to repose in any man.

I wish now to ask, what has the Texas and Pacific Railway Company accomplished to entitle it to the favorable consideration of Congress? Instead of constructing its road westward from Marshall, in Texas, according to the requirements of the acts of 1871 and 1872, it has constructed about seventy miles of road from Marshall northward to Texarkana, and about one hundred and fifty-five miles from Texarkana westward to Sherman. On its main line westward, from Marshall, it claims to have constructed about one hundred and eighty-four miles to Fort Worth; but, in fact, about twenty-five miles of this part of the line was built by the Southern Pacific Railway Company of Texas before the Texas and Pacific Company came into the field. So that this company, since the passage of the act of 1871, has constructed only about one hundred and sixty miles of the main line provided for by Congress. It is claimed that this company has built about four hundred and fifty miles of road in Texas without any aid from the Government. That is true enough. But the company has received a land grant from Texas of twenty sections of land to the mile for every mile of road constructed. I have information, which I deem reliable, that the State of Texas has granted to the present company, the Texas and Pacific, 5,173,120 acres of land; and this does not include lands previously granted to the Memphis and El Paso and the Southern Pacific Companies, which have been merged in the Texas and Pacific. Now, what is the value of this land? In a very able speech delivered in the House of Representatives by Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, on this question of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, on May 4, 1876, I find the following; speaking of the value of the Texas lands which this company then offered as security to the Government for the guarantee of the interest on the bonds, Mr. CULBERSON said:

> The value of the Texas lands may be estimated with absolute safety at $2 per acre.

And again he says:

> I have said, sir, that the present value of the Texas lands may be placed at $2 per acre; but when the road shall have penetrated the country beyond the rising city of Fort Worth and the gaps between Paris and Texarkana, and Sherman and Fort Worth shall have been completed, the enhanced value of these lands will augment this security more than double.

From this it will be seen, if we take Mr. CULBERSON'S lowest estimate of the value of these lands, that this company has already received from Texas more than $10,000,000 in value. If the company had built its road through Texas to El Paso, on the Rio Grande, it would have received from Texas, in round numbers, about fourteen millions of acres of land. This would represent a value of $28,000,000, at Mr. CULBERSON'S lowest estimate.

I proceed now to consider the twelfth section of the bill reported by the committee. It is the section which provides for, or rather does not provide for, a connection of the road with the Mississippi River. It is that section which meets my most determined opposition. So far as I am concerned, no bill shall ever become a law which does not certainly provide for good and adequate routes to the Mississippi, so as to give the Southern States east of that river their due and proportionate share of benefits. Let us examine this section critically for if it does not compel the Texas Pacific Company to extend its line from Marshall to the Mississippi, then there is nothing in the bill to that end. Let us look at it in the light of the past and judge what the intentions of its projectors are as developed by their acts heretofore. Recollect that the president and controlling man of the Texas Pacific is also the controller of roads extending from Philadelphia to Saint Louis; that among the many bills brought forward for the completion of the Texas Pacific road, that bill which stopped the road at Marshall, Texas, two hundred and fifty miles west of the Mississippi, and established a direct connection with Saint Louis by way of Vinita, was most vehemently and persistently urged, although the Vinita connection, or extension, was positively prohibited in the original charter. Viewed in these lights, and in the light of its own terms, I insist that the twelfth section will never be executed so as to establish a connection with the Mississippi, and that no such connection or route is intended or contemplated by its projectors and abettors.

The first provision is that as soon as the terminus is fixed the first-mortgage bonds for the construction of a road from some point on the Texas and Pacific line to the Mississippi shall be offered to capitalists, but it is carefully stated that the mortgage shall not include any part of the projected line of road west of Fort Worth. That is to say, no part of the road aided by Government shall be mortgaged to build any part of the road from Marshall to the Mississippi, which receives no aid from the Government, and for which none is asked by the Texas Pacific managers. In other words, the extension of the Texas Pacific road to the Mississippi is left to build itself, if it can, with the strong intimation from its managers and controllers that the extension is not desired by them, and that they will make no effort to secure it. If this is not so, why are they not asking for aid?

Next, the terminus on the Mississippi, if, despite the efforts of its controllers to prevent it, the road should ever arrive there, is to be fixed by five commissioners to be appointed by the President:

> Who shall examine the various proposed routes between the Mississippi River and the present constructed road of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, and after considering all questions of distance, cost, and transportation routes, in view of foreign as well as domestic trade and commerce and also in view of an eligible connection with the Atlantic seaboard, and report where the line should be and where it shall connect with the Mississippi River.

Now, these are complicated, important, and onerous duties. The commissioners would have to examine with great care (for otherwise they could make no correct estimate of the probable cost) at least three long lines—one to Memphis, one to Vicksburgh, and one to New Orleans. These three routes could only be properly examined at the expense of much labor, time, and money, and yet there is no time fixed for the commissioners to begin the work or to make their report upon it. In the event that they should disagree and make no report there is no authority to appoint another commission, and if they should agree and report, their action has to be approved by the President.

But if the commissioners should make a report and the President should approve it, what then? Why, the Texas and Pacific Company can let the matter drop right there, if it chooses, for there is nowhere in the bill any clause which obliges them to build the connection by imposing a penalty for failure. In one of the House bills there was a clause providing for forfeiture, but in the Senate bill now under consideration, and which the Texas and Pacific Company are urging, that clause is conspicuous by its absence. I will read it for the information of the Senate:

And provided further, That the said Texas and Pacific Railway Company shall have the right to purchase the charter, franchises, and property of any existing line, if any there be, on the selected route, or construct a new one, at the option of said company; and that a failure to so purchase or construct, at the rate herein provided, on the eastern extension, shall work an absolute forfeiture of all right to the guarantee of the Government on the interest of the bonds to be issued for so much of the line as may remain unconstructed at the time of such default.

Thus it will be seen that no time is fixed for commencing or completing the connection to the Mississippi, and no penalty is imposed if it is never made. Twenty years hence the Texas and Pacific Company can say, if this connection is not built, "Congress did not require us to build it and we did not choose to do it. The fault is not in us, but in Congress." And they would have justification for so saying. And the same men who tell us and tell the world that they are unable to build the road west of Fort Worth with a large land grant and $10,000 per mile in greenbacks ask us to believe them when they say that they are going to extend their line to some point on the Mississippi, and that, too, without aid of any sort from the Government. They say they cannot borrow money to continue a road partly constructed and actually running, but that they can borrow money to construct a road upon which not a spadeful of earth has been moved and the terminus of which is unknown.

This twelfth section also provides that the authority of the State or States through which the line may be located shall be obtained before the road shall be built, and that the eastern terminus shall be on the east bank of the Mississippi River, wherever this point may be designated. Now, it is not improbable that some point in the State of Mississippi might be designated as the eastern terminus, and I am informed that the Legislature of that State does not meet again until the year 1880, so that there would necessarily be a long delay in obtaining the consent of that State.

The great purpose in building a southern transcontinental road is to connect the country watered by the lower Mississippi with the Pacific coast. For years Congress has been besieged on the subject, and now it is asked to pass a bill which does not provide for such connection. There is not one word or line in the bill of the committee which renders such a connection a certainty. This defect alone is sufficient cause for my opposition to the bill, and hence I have antagonized it with mine, which does make connection with the Mississippi by more than one route certain and effectual.

Shreveport, which is in the State of Louisiana, is now the virtual terminus of the Texas and Pacific road. It is from that point that the extension to the Mississippi River under the provisions of the twelfth section of bill 942 would be made. Now, the consent of all the States through which any part of the road is to be made must, under the bill, be first obtained. If Memphis be the point selected, then Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee must all give their consent. If Vicksburgh is chosen, then Louisiana and Mississippi must express their approval through their Legislatures. But, as I have said, the Legislature of Mississippi will not meet till 1880; so that, with the utmost efforts and good faith on the part of the company, this connection could not be commenced for two years. But there is nothing to compel the company to endeavor to procure the consent of the States; and if they did, is it sure they would succeed? Louisiana might think the road ought to go to New Orleans, and refuse to agree that either Memphis or Vicksburgh should be the terminus. Thus it will be seen with what difficulties the making of the eastern connection is surrounded, what opportunities it gives for delay and inaction if desired, and how even the utmost and most zealous efforts on the part of the company to carry out the requirements of the twelfth section might nevertheless fail of success; for note all that has to be done:

First. The appointment of a commission.

Second. The meeting of the commission and their examination of the various routes.

Third. The agreement in a report upon a subject upon which so much and so many different things are to be considered.

Fourth. The approval of this report by the President.

Fifth. The consent of all the States through which the road is to pass, which may be three in one event.

Sixth. After this is done and accomplished, then there is no obligation upon the company to take another step, no mode of compelling them.

The company has sought to impose conditions upon itself that are unnecessary and may be impossible: unnecessary, because nobody can think that it is necessary to obtain leave from the State to buy an existing railroad franchise; and possibly impossible, because the consent of the States may never be given.

Why should Congress delegate its power to select a terminus on the Mississippi to a board, no matter how or of whom constituted? What good can result to the country at large, or to that neglected and desolated section of it for whose regeneration this road is especially urged, by leaving it undetermined, as this bill does, where the eastern terminus of the road is to be, or whether it is to reach the Mississippi or not? To enact a law in this shape is an evasion of responsibility, and I for one recognize that it is the duty of Congress to fix the eastern terminus or termini and insist on the exercise of the duty.

There has been a great deal said about the necessity of building this Texas and Pacific line in order to prevent another company from establishing what is rhetorically described as a grinding monopoly. If the Texas and Pacific is not built, it is said the Southern Pacific of California will build its road to the Gulf of Mexico, or somewhere else, and the whole country will have to pay tribute to these railroad princes of the Pacific coast. Mr. President, I am not as much alarmed about monopolies as some gentlemen appear to be. The intelligent people of this country do not intend to tolerate monopolies. There may be exceptional cases, where for a time portions of the people may be obliged to submit to unreasonable exactions; but nothing that can be properly called a monopoly can exist in these United States. In the case before us, if the Southern Pacific Railroad Company shall push their road across the continent to the Gulf of Mexico, it will be simply because their overtures are rejected by those with whom they are entirely willing to share the business that will legitimately belong to this southern line of road. The Southern Pacific Company are not intruders here. That Company was authorized by the act of 1871 to connect with the Texas and Pacific Company at the Colorado River, the boundary line between California and the Territory of Arizona. That company has built its road to that point, and the Texas and Pacific is twelve hundred and fifty miles away from the proposed point of connection. Is it a monstrous and altogether outrageous thing that this western company should ask permission, under these circumstances, to build its road eastward until it shall meet some other road connecting with the Gulf and Atlantic States? And how does it happen, Mr. President, that what was urged a short year ago as in the interest of the country should now be denounced as a monstrous thing which will result in fastening a grinding monopoly on the people? It will be remembered that at the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress Mr. LAMAR, of Mississippi, then chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee of the House, reported to the House of Representatives a bill, by which it was proposed that the Texas and Pacific and the Southern Pacific of California should connect at a point in the Territory of New Mexico one hundred miles west of El Paso. That bill contained provisions for eastern connections with the Mississippi River similar to those contained in bill No. 1186, and was supported by the Texas and Pacific Company. In reporting the bill to the House of Representatives, Mr. LAMAR said:

THE INTERESTS OF THE PEOPLE PROTECTED AGAINST COMBINATION OR MONOPOLY.

As to the interests of the people, it will be observed that the bill makes it impossible for the trunk line to become a monopoly strong enough to sacrifice local interests, for every local connection has the right under the provisions of the bill to use the trunk line as if it were in fact a part of it, and this right is capable of legal enforcement. It will be further observed that the bill provides for control by Congress over the rates for transportation of freight and passengers, and for postal and telegraphic service.

I ask again how is it that what was so good in 1877 is so bad in 1878? If the Texas and Pacific Company were willing to unite with the Southern Pacific for the accomplishment of a grand object then, why are they not now? What has occurred within the last twelve months to alter so completely the whole situation? To me it appears that the reasons are stronger now for the acceptance by the Texas and Pacific of the principles of the bill No. 1186 than they were then, because the Southern Pacific has made a good deal of progress within that time. The Southern Pacific Company has the right under general law to build through the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. When it reaches the Rio Grande, under the general incorporation act of the State of Texas it may form an organization to build through the State of Texas, and will become entitled to the land grant of sixteen sections to the mile which that State gives to every company which constructs a railroad within its limits. If the extension to the Gulf of Mexico of this Southern Pacific Railroad is a thing to be feared, I see no better way to prevent it than by the passage of bill No. 1186, to make it certain that other lines of railroad will meet it at El Paso.

I will now briefly consider, Mr. President, the bill No. 1186 introduced by me as amended by the Railroad Committee of the Senate. It proposes to secure the construction of a through line from El Paso, on the Rio Grande, to San Francisco, San Diego, and San Pedro, on the Pacific coast, with two branches from El Paso toward the Mississippi River, and connection on the Mississippi with Saint Louis, Memphis, Vicksburgh, and New Orleans. It also provides for a branch from a point in the Territory of New Mexico to connect the Southern Pacific of California with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road. It is known that the Southern Pacific road of California has a completed line connecting San Francisco with Fort Yuma, on the Colorado River, in Arizona Territory. This road has a branch running to a point within less than one hundred miles of San Diego. My bill proposes to authorize this company to build eastward to El Paso, on the western boundary of Texas, and to give it the same land grant offered by the act of 1871 to the Texas and Pacific Company. It also proposes to extend the Texas and Pacific line from Fort Worth to El Paso and to aid the construction of a line from San Antonio, in Texas, to El Paso. As above stated, the bill also provides for connections with four points on the Mississippi River. One of these connections is to be made by building a branch from a point on the Texas and Pacific line in the neighborhood of the intersection of that line with the one hundredth degree of longitude west to Vinita, in the Indian Territory, which is an extension in a southwestern direction of the old Atlantic and Pacific Railroad. The lines east of the Rio Grande provided for by the bill are as follows:

	Miles.
From Fort Worth to El Paso	650
From San Antonio to El Paso	600
From Orange, Texas, to Donaldsonville, Louisiana	150
From Shreveport, Louisiana, to Monroe, Louisiana	96
From Shreveport to New Orleans, (about)	300
From Jefferson, Texas, to Memphis	300
From Texas and Pacific line to Vinita	350
	2,446

The line connecting the Southern Pacific of California with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Road will be about three hundred and fifty miles in length, making a total of about twenty-eight hundred miles. The completion of these lines of road would give direct rail connection between San Francisco and San Diego on the Pacific, and Galveston, New Orleans, Vicksburgh, Memphis, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago, and through these points with the whole Gulf and Atlantic seaboard from Mobile to Portland. The bill proposes that the Government shall aid in the construction of all these lines, except the Southern Pacific of California, to the extent of $10,000 per mile of completed road. This $10,000 is not to be advanced in bonds, as was done with the Central and Union Pacific roads, nor by indorsing bonds, as the Texas and Pacific proposes, but in Treasury notes or such other currency as the Government uses. The people are not to be taxed to pay interest, but on the contrary receive 4 per cent. from the companies. It is the difference to the people between paying interest and receiving interest, between sending nearly $2,000,000 abroad every year for fifty years (for the chances are that the bonds, will be negotiated in Europe) and thus swelling the drain which has been impoverishing us, and retaining at home the whole amount invested in the work. The Government shall not pay out one dollar except for road already constructed and equipped. This makes it imperative that private capital shall take the initiative, and the Government will only advance its aid after sections of road are completed and in a condition to repay the amounts advanced. The bill provides that the companies receiving aid from the Government under its provisions shall be obliged at all times to transport supplies, munitions and materials of war, the United States mails, and to do all manner of railroad and telegraph service that the Government may require, and that all sums of money earned by the companies for services to the Government shall be credited to the companies, and no money shall be paid out of the Treasury for such services until the whole amount advanced to said companies, respectively, together with 4 per cent. interest per annum thereon, shall have been repaid to the Government.

The bill further provides:

That the rights of the Government provided for in the preceding section as against the companies named in the first, third, and fourth sections of this act, both as to preference of service and as to the withholding of payment therefor until all advances of money made to any of said companies are repaid, shall be continuing rights, running with the property against present or future proprietors of the said railroad and telegraph lines so receiving aid in money under the provisions of this act. And if the sums advanced by the Government, together with 4 per cent. interest per annum thereon, shall not have been repaid at the expiration of twenty years from the date of the final completion of the said railroad and telegraph lines, respectively, then the account between the Government and the said railroad companies, respectively, shall be stated and adjusted under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and to the aggregate sum of principal and interest that may be then due to the Government there shall be added interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum for another period of twenty years, which last aggregate sum of principal and interest shall be paid by the said companies, respectively, in forty semi-annual payments: Provided, That whatever sums are earned by the said companies, respectively, for services rendered to the Government as hereinbefore provided shall continue to be credited to the said companies, respectively, as before. And whatever sums may be necessary, after allowing such credits, to make up the amounts so to be paid semi-annually by the said companies, respectively, shall be paid out of the earnings of the said companies, respectively. And the Government of the United States shall have a lien upon the earnings of the said companies, respectively, for such amounts as may be necessary to make up said semi-annual payments, which lien shall have precedence of all other liens whatsoever, and may be enforced in such manner as Congress shall direct.

There can be no doubt that under the provisions of this bill every dollar advanced by the Government, with 4 per cent. per annum interest, will be paid. Under the provisions of the Texas and Pacific bill for the single line from Fort Worth to San Diego, it will require earnings of $1,135 per mile per annum to pay the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the Government. The advocates of that bill insist that the road cannot fail to earn a larger amount than $1,135 per annum. Now, under the provisions of this bill it will only require earnings to the amount of $400 per mile per annum to pay the interest on the amount advanced by the Government. If we assume that the amounts earned on these lines for mail transportation and telegraphic services to the Government for the first twenty years after their completion shall not be more than enough to pay the interest on the amount advanced by the Government, without reducing the principal, a very simple calculation will show that for another period of twenty years it will only require $900 earnings per mile per annum to pay off the whole amount advanced by the Government, with interest. My bill will secure the construction of about thirty-four hundred miles of road at an outlay in money on the part of the Government of about $28,000,000, to be advanced by the Government during six years of construction, while the Texas and Pacific bill proposes to build fourteen hundred miles of road, if the Government will guarantee the payment of 5 per cent. interest for fifty years on $38,750,000. Every Senator can decide for himself which of these two measures to support.

I have heard it said, Mr. President, that this bill asks a direct subsidy from the Government, while the Texas and Pacific bill asks no subsidy whatever. I do not stand here, sir, to try to deceive any one by specious arguments which do not convince my own judgment. I firmly believe what I have said, that under the provisions of this bill the lines of roads provided for will be built, and that every dollar advanced by the Government will be repaid with interest. I do not consider an advance which is to be repaid with interest as a subsidy any more than a loan of money to a solvent and responsible party is a gift. My bill proposes that the Government shall aid those who have first put down their own money, and who have created by their labor and with their own means a sound and adequate security.

I consider the proposed line from San Antonio, in Texas, to El Paso, on the Rio Grande, of the utmost importance to this southern system of railways, and to the whole country. That line will secure the proper connection with Galveston and the Lower Mississippi River, and thus extend the benefits of the transcontinental line to the South Atlantic States. The construction of this line will also result in railway connections with the interior of Mexico. In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a passage in the very able report made at the present session of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on the relations of the United States with Mexico. After discussing the importance of steamship communication between our ports and the ports of Mexico, that committee said:

Of far more promise and importance to our commercial intercourse, but requiring more time for its practical application, would be the extension of one or more of our lines of railroad into Mexico.

That there are no serious physical difficulties in the way of such extension has been well known since the time of Humboldt's visit to Mexico, at the beginning of this century. In his political essay on New Spain, that eminent observer, who paid particular attention to the topography of the country, with reference to its facilities for commerce, gives an accurate and most interesting geographical description of the portion of Mexico that would be so traversed. The following statement in its principal features is taken mainly from his observations:

The eastern coast of Mexico has, properly speaking, no port; for Vera Cruz is merely a bad anchorage between the shallows of La Caleta, La Gallega, and La Lavandera. From this port, such as it is, a narrow belt of lowland extends to the mountains, and then there is an ascent, which is almost impracticable for a railway to the principal, most desirable, and most populous part of Mexico, the high tableland on which the City of Mexico as well as all the most important cities are situated. There is not in the whole country, after leaving the Gulf coast, a single navigable river.

From the City of Mexico the high table-lands extend with a gradual descent toward the north to Texas and as far as New Mexico. Humboldt expressly calls attention to this admirable topography for a wagon-road, and points out how from the line of Louisiana, an almost uninterrupted plain leads with a very gradual ascent to the plateau upon which the City of Mexico is situated.

South of the Rio Grande there is not a noticeable river to be crossed.

The distinguished geographer speaks of wagon-roads simply because railroads were not then known. But from his remarks, confirmed as they have been by all subsequent observers, the conclusion is irresistible that if any country is both destined to be developed by railroads and dependent on railroads for its development, it is the high table-land of Mexico from the City of Mexico to the Rio Grande, and that nature itself indicates the line for such railroads. One or more railroads extended from Texas into Mexico on this natural route would connect the important cities of Monterey, San Luis Potosi, Durango, Zacatecas, Aguas Calientes, Guadalajara, Leon, Guanajuato, Queretaro, the City of Mexico, and many others with our country.

In my opinion, Mr. President, there are very few persons who correctly estimate the importance of the commerce that must grow up between this country and Mexico whenever railways from Texas shall penetrate the interior of that republic and the cordial relations which ought to exist between the United States and her neighbor shall repose on a solid foundation. It will be greater than that which was the boast of Venice "when she held the gorgeous East in fee."

The importance of this great transcontinental line of railway cannot be better stated than it was by my honorable friend the Senator from Mississippi in his late speech in the Senate. That Senator presented the whole subject with characteristic force and breadth of view. For myself, Mr. President, I have a profound conviction that we ought, before the adjournment of Congress, to take such measures as will secure the speedy construction of the lines of railway provided for by my bill. Their construction will revive the crippled industries of the South, and the beneficial results will be felt by the whole country. The construction of the line from San Antonio to El Paso will give peace to the frontier between Texas and Mexico, and cannot fail to develop in a short time the most intimate commercial relations between the United States and that wonderful country whose matchless wealth and romantic beauty moved to enthusiasm the philosophic mind of Humboldt, and which is destined at no distant day to pour into the lap of commerce treasures surpassing all that was ever dreamed of by its Spanish conquerors.

If I did not most sincerely believe that the measure proposed by me is best for the people, best for the Government, and best for the roads themselves I would withdraw it. I have nothing so much at
